Crisis of Confidence

THINGS have come to a pretty pass when commentators at home and overseas can refer, without fear of contradiction, to the British economy as the 'sick man of Europe'. Were the nation in the state of the nineteenth century Ottoman Empire there would be stronger grounds for that description. In fact, living standards for the mass of the community have never been higher; deprivation in Britain today for many households is no longer lack of nourishment due to unemployment. For many gainfully occupied householders it is little more than the lack of a modern TV set, or a week-end car – in short, of living standards, where little more than half the expenditure of many households is absorbed by necessities.

Yet the basic malaise of the UK economy can hardly be denied. The benefits of devaluation for UK exports have been disappointingly slow to emerge. Hopes have been raised by the better than usual November trade figures but there is the fear that, as on so many previous occasions, those hopes will be proved premature. Nevertheless, the economic commentators have, of late, been reasonably optimistic.

The National Institute Economic Review anticipates a higher rate of economic growth in 1969 than seemed likely a few months ago; rising investment is expected to lead the new growth phase. Since consumer expenditure is expected to fall off as the result of the pre-Christmas spending spree and the higher level of indirect taxation, there are grounds for believing that the growth in imports will moderate while exports will rise in the reasonably buoyant world markets.

The Economic Survey of the UK prepared by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development was even more optimistic. It asserts that monetary conditions will become tighter in the next few months as the Government collects its tax revenues and eliminates its borrowing requirement. The full benefits of devaluation can, states the Survey, now be expected to emerge provided domestic costs and prices are kept under reasonable control. In a recent letter to The Times, Professor Nicholas Kaldor has expressed similar views, noting in particular that a better allocation of labour arising from the higher SET and improved management would make a contribution to a more competitive and dynamic economy.

In the light of such optimistic and even confident expectations, it is understandable that Ministers should feel aggrieved and even slightly resentful that the fruits of their efforts have received so little public recognition and so much criticism, particularly as reflected in the public opinion polls and recent editorials. Equally understandable, however, is the public's attitude.

Public opinion, as every politician knows, is fickle and highly volatile. If 1969 should prove to be a year of economic prosperity then the Government's electoral prospects will probably be transformed. At the moment it is all too clear that the electorate neither shares Government spokesmen's hopes, nor the optimism of the economic forecasters. More serious is the fact that if the recent level of investment and industrial expectations in this respect are any guide, industry sees no strong grounds for believing that growth is only around the corner.

Confidence in the Government's ability to restore the country's economic fortunes is at a low ebb. And if the average industrialist and worker is not impressed with Government policies it is hardly surprising that, even with the current Bank rate, foreign funds are not returning to London. There are still too many occasions when sterling has to be supported by the Bank of England. Not all Britain's currency difficulties can be ascribed to speculators, whether they be at home or abroad. The speculation feeds on the country's unimpressive economic performance, over-extended resources, and lack of clear signs that 1969 will bring a significant change.

What are the reasons for expecting – as against merely hoping in Micawber fashion – that things will improve? The first and most important fact is that world trade is likely to remain reasonably buoyant; the second is that a common fear of the consequences of collapse should ensure sufficient international co-operation to maintain the international exchange system in tolerable working order. On the domestic front prices have risen less rapidly than was expected; some increases in incomes have, for the time being at least, borne some slight resemblance to productivity.

The preparedness of the Government to allow the figure of registered unemployed to stay above the half million mark is now taken for granted. In such conditions, with consumer expenditure almost certain to fall off unless there is a widespread cessation of personal saving, imports should at best stabilize and competition at home should – at least in theory – enhance the attractions of normally less profitable exports.

The crucial statistic will be the extent to which the UK's share in world trade begins to rise. The continuing expansion of exports has obscured the fact that UK export growth has been relatively slower than that in other countries. As world trade conditions harden during 1969, it is imperative to demonstrate Britain's capacity to compete.

Likewise, the tighter credit conditions and restrictions on domestic demand should discourage some imports. Some import substitution – which has been markedly absent – should soon appear. Even the invisible balance should improve, assuming Britain continues to attract overseas visitors as of late and oil and shipping earnings increase.

But even assuming that 1969 does produce a surplus on the balance of payments, it is not likely to approach the £500 million needed. Furthermore, a surplus of this magnitude is needed not just in 1969, but for a decade and more beyond. The weight of recent international borrowing, coupled with the need to rebuild the country's reserves, means that any improvement in the external trade account will be bespoken for years ahead; it will not be available for distribution at home. In any case it is difficult to believe that in the foreseeable future the present restrictions on capital movements can be removed.

What is not yet realized by the public is that even in the most favourable economic circumstances, it will remain imperative for the Government to continue the control of incomes and consumer spending. No one need have, to paraphrase Lloyd George, any fears that any taxes will be removed in the next Budget or two! By the same token it follows that the economy will have to be run with a margin of unused capacity for a long time yet, at least until an export-led expansion is firmly based upon a substantial balance of payments surplus.

Nor can it be assumed that this happier combination of events will appear of its own volition. To pretend that devaluation alone will in time cure the British sickness is ridiculous. The OECD survey observes that to ensure that labour and management are willing to keep costs and prices competitive, 'strict adherence to the rather strict incomes policy' will be needed. In addition, measures to increase efficiency throughout the economy are needed, such as 'making better use of the available labour supply, for improving the performance of management and for achieving a better industrial structure'.

No Government can afford, in the light of such requirements, to tolerate periodic repetitions of the Girling strike, or the tactics of the manual workers' steel unions to freeze out the new white-collar unions. More competitive conditions in the domestic economy will impose new demands on management; profits are likely to be much harder to earn. But if such a policy is to be effective, then it also requires of the Government similar restraint. Some check on mounting public sector expenditure must be imposed and, to the extent that competitive forces are to be relied upon to generate efficiency, the Government's penchant for intervention in business and industrial affairs needs to be curbed.

Estate Duty Aggregation – I

SECTION 38 of the Finance Act 1968 has made sweeping changes in the established law governing the aggregation of property passing, or deemed to pass, on a death. The rate of duty rises with the total amount passing on the death. Where this exceeds £1,000,000 the rate is 80 per cent and applies to the totality. There is unhappily no system of different rates for different slices on surtax lines. Not surprisingly, therefore, the practice has grown of arranging matters so that some property is excluded from aggregation with the result that lower rates of duty apply. These matters can be understood only in the context of the history of the legislation.

We begin with section 4 of the Finance Act 1894 which, as amended in 1900, reads:

> 'For determining the rate of estate duty to be paid on any property passing on the death of the deceased, all property so passing in respect of which estate duty is leviable shall be aggregated so as to form one estate, and the duty shall be levied at the proper graduated rate on the principal value thereof:
> 'Provided that any property so passing, in which the deceased never had an interest . . . shall not be aggregated with any other property but shall be levied at the proper graduated rate on the principal value thereof; . . .'

It is established that references to property passing on the death included references to property deemed to pass on the death (Sanderson v. CIR ([1956] AC 491); Public Trustee v. CIR ([1960] AC 368)). Section 4 was introduced owing to the practice (already prevalent in 1894) of defining in wills and settlements, a 'perpetuity period' so as to maximize the period during which property could legally be tied up. Such period was a life in being and 21 years thereafter. It was common to designate such descendant of Queen Victoria (living at the date of the settlement) as should survive all the others. At the end of this perpetuity period the settled property would probably 'pass' in the estate duty sense. Moreover, since the term of passing was expressed as 21 years after the death of the chosen member of Royalty, it would be deemed to be a passing 'on' his death. This is because of section 22 (1) (b) which provides:

> 'The expression "property passing on the death" includes property passing either immediately on the death or after any interval, either certainly or contingently, and either originally or by way of substitutive limitation, and the expression "on the death" includes "at a period ascertainable only by reference to the death".'

Thus 21 years after the death of a member of Royalty or some other chosen life, it might well be that vast quantities of property would be deemed to pass, with which the deceased had no connection at all. Nevertheless but for the proviso to section 4, all that property would be aggregated together with a considerable increase in the rate of duty.

This would perhaps not be so disastrous in 1894 when the maximum rate was only 8 per cent but for the last 22 years the maximum rate has been a confiscatory 80 per cent. It is therefore not surprising that the proviso to section 4 has been widely used by donors for the purpose of enabling their donees to avoid or reduce estate duty payable under the inter vivos gift provisions (as applied by the Finance Act 1894, section 2 (1) (c)) where the donor was unlikely to survive for the necessary statutory period – a period which was originally three months but is now seven years.

A common method chosen was for the donor to apply money in bringing into existence a piece of property which, from the moment of its inception, did not belong to the donor at all but to the donee. The most convenient form of such property is a life policy. Usually the donor is also the life assured.

Prior to the passing of the Finance Act 1954 each separate policy was treated for the purposes of the proviso as an estate by itself; i.e., there was no provision for the aggregation of the policies inter se. Section 33 (2) of the Finance Act 1954 then provided for a limited aggregation for the following kinds of property passing (or deemed to pass) on the death in which the deceased never had an interest:

(i) policies of assurance on the life of the deceased; and

(ii) moneys received under policies within (i); and

(iii) interests in (i) and (ii).

All the above kinds of property are described in section 33 (2) as 'life insurance'. Paragraph (a) of section 33 (2) provided that all the life insurance belonging to any one person absolutely and indefeasibly immediately after the death (otherwise than by virtue of a purchase for consideration in money or money's worth), was to be aggregated and the appropriate rate of estate duty payable on such life insurance as passed (or was deemed to pass) on the death was the rate applicable to an estate of the same value as the aggregate value of the life insurance. All other chargeable life insurances in which the deceased never had an interest (i.e., not belonging indefeasibly to one person) were aggregated together and their aggregate value determined the rate of estate duty on them. By virtue of section 38 of the Finance Act 1968, section 33 is now confined to deaths occurring before March 20th, 1968.

For the purposes of section 33 (2) life insurance which was exempt otherwise than under the provisions for relief for small estates, was ignored (proviso (i)). For the purposes of the calculation under section 33 (2), no deduction was made for any mortgage or charge on the life insurance (proviso (ii)). The provisions for aggregation inter se of life insurances were extended in relation to certain annuity contracts by the Finance Act 1956, section 35 and the Finance Act 1957, section 39.

As a result of the decision in Re Hodge's Policy ([1958] Ch. 239), section 34 of the Finance Act 1959 was passed. Section 34 (1) abolished the charge to duty on life policy moneys which had been imposed by the fourth paragraph of section 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889, combined with section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894 and section 76 of the Finance Act 1948.

Section 34 (2) introduced a new method of charge where the deceased had paid premiums on a policy on his own life for someone else's benefit. The premiums are treated as gifts and the property passing is deemed to be a proportion of the total policy moneys, depending on the proportion of premiums paid by the deceased in the vulnerable period to the total premiums. Section 34 (2) is confined to policies on the deceased's own life which have been 'kept up' and therefore does not extend to single premium policies (Barclays Bank Ltd v. A.G. ([1944] AC 372); Lord Wright at page 379).

Section 34 (3) deals with all policies, whether on the deceased's life or not, which apart from section 34 (2) would (under section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894) be deemed to pass on his death by reason of any 'dealing' with the policy (normally a gift of the policy itself).

Here again, what is deemed to pass is a proportion of the policy moneys. In this case the proportion is arrived at by the formula set out in section 34 (4). This subsection is capable of extending to single premium policies. In the case of a policy on the deceased's own life which is not a single premium policy the two subsections are cumulative, i.e., liability can arise on the same policy under subsection (2) and under subsection (3) within the limit of the total value.

Section 34 (4) of the Finance Act 1959 contains the rules for valuing policies under subsections (2) and (3). It reads:

> 'For the purposes of the two foregoing subsections the value of a policy shall be determined as follows:
> (a) Subject to the following paragraph, the value shall be taken to be the value, as at the death, of the benefits receivable under the policy on the death or other event on which they are receivable;
> (b) The foregoing paragraph shall not apply in relation to any payment of a premium or dealing with a policy if any dealing with the policy has subsequently taken place either so as to alter the beneficial interest in the rights under the policy or by way of surrender, but in such a case the value shall be ascertained by reference to the time of the subsequent dealing (or of the first, if there has been more than one), and shall be taken to be the value at that time of the consideration therefor, or if there was no consideration or (in the case of a dealing other than a surrender) its value was less than the market value of the policy at that time, that market value.'

If the policy has been mortgaged it would seem that no deduction is allowable therefor (see Re Hodge's Policy ([1958] Ch. 239) – decided on the fourth paragraph of section 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889; see, in particular, Evershed, M.R., [1958] Ch., at page 255). Given that duty is paid under section 34 of the Finance Act 1959 then section 38 of the Finance Act 1957 has no application (section 34 (7)) except the small part of section 38 of the Finance Act 1957 dealing with the marginal £500 exemption (ibid.).

Notwithstanding the changes introduced by section 33 (2) of the Finance Act 1954, avoidance of estate duty continued unabated and culminated in Ralli Bros Trustee Co Ltd v. CIR ([1967] 3 WLR 1274). Mrs Ralli executed a settlement on October 12th, 1961, under which she covenanted with the trustee company to effect a policy of assurance on her own life for the benefit of the beneficiary. The next day the trustee company submitted a proposal form to the insurance company and also sent the insurance company a cheque for the premium of £100,000 which was debited to Mrs Ralli on the third day. On that same third day the insurance company issued an acceptance note. The policy was delivered at the end of November 1961 and Mrs Ralli died on December 24th, 1961, whereupon, under the terms of the policy, the sum of £100,000 (i.e., equivalent to the first premium) became payable to the trustee company as trustee of Mrs Ralli's settlement.

The Trustee company conceded that estate duty was payable as on a gift within section 38 (2) (a) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881, as applied by section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894. The trustee company argued, however, that the subject-matter of the gift was not the £100,000 cash which Mrs Ralli had paid but the policy itself, and that Mrs Ralli had never had an interest in that policy. The Trustee company succeeded; hence section 38 which applies to all deaths after March 19th, 1968 (subsection (6)).

Solicitors and Accountants

ACCOUNTANCY is not the only profession to be preoccupied at the present time with future planning. At the National Conference of the Law Society held in October, one of the panel sessions was devoted to the first interim report of the Special Committee on the Future of the Profession, under the chairmanship of Sir Derek Hilton, a Past President of the Society. The report of this session as published in the December issue of The Law Society's Gazette, contains much that will be of interest to accountants.

Introducing the proceedings, Sir Derek particularly requested the views of members on the question of 'mixed partnerships' – between solicitors and members of other professions – a matter on which the special committee had not yet reached its conclusions but would certainly do so in its next report. The first question, he said, was whether the creation of mixed partnerships would result in a better service to the public and he instanced the measure of common ground between solicitors and chartered accountants in tax, company and trust matters. If the participation of, say, one or two solicitors in a firm of accountants (or vice versa) proved unacceptable, should solicitors then employ accountants and put their names on the firm's notepaper?

To digress for a moment, we are not ourselves aware (as, indeed, the contributor of our current series on professional ethics observed in the article on 'Inconsistent and inadmissible activities' in The Accountant of December 21st) of any obstacle to the employment of accountants by solicitors, or of solicitors by accountants, although the specific point of 'names on the notepaper' was not dealt with in that article. In general, the principal societies of accountants have not hitherto objected to their members' names being shown as employees on a professional letterhead, provided that (1) it is made sufficiently clear that such persons are not members of the firm; (2) they are not accorded a description indicating a particular specialization or expertise within the general field of an accountant's work; and (3) where the letterhead is not that of a firm of accountants, the employee is not retained for the purpose of enabling that business to offer accountancy services in any manner not consistent with the obligations of an accountant in public practice. Nor do we think that a solicitor who happened also to hold an accounting qualification could fairly be restrained from using, if he so desired, the designatory initials appropriate to it. However, at the Law Society's conference, one speaker alleged that his firm had formerly employed an accountant whose name had appeared on the firm's notepaper, but the Law Society had requested its removal and the accountant left the firm in consequence, feeling that as a professional man in his own right he was entitled to recognition and an acknowledgement of the work he was undertaking.

The discussion at the conference panel session showed a wide variety of opinions. One speaker called on the Law Society to face squarely that the future for solicitors lay in 'dropping the barriers' with accountants, arguing that solicitors had much to learn from their accountancy brethren, who had fared better than they in expanding their interests, in handling their affairs, and as masters of their own charges. Evidently the lack of an official scale of fees for accountants is not entirely disadvantageous.

Other speakers strongly opposed the idea of mixed partnerships. One stressed the peculiar status of solicitors as officers of the Court and, whilst he valued the assistance of accountants in the same way as that of 'orthopaedic surgeons, handwriting experts, surveyors and other specialists', he saw no reason for bringing such people into solicitors' firms either as partners or as employees. Another regarded it as 'highly dangerous' for accountants or members of any other profession to be imported into a solicitor's office, regarding this as an abrogation by lawyers of their own responsibilities. He said the [legal] profession should train its own specialists. Despite a warning at an earlier conference of 'Inroads into solicitors' work, since then solicitors have allowed accountants to take on even more of that work', and if the trend continued it would become commonplace not for solicitors to employ accountants but for solicitors to be employed in the offices of accountants, estate agents or other professions'. A third speaker stated that he already made it a practice to bring the client's accountants into consultation on trust or company matters; the accountants were normally willing to collaborate in a joint report and he saw no particular advantage in having them as members of the firm.

A third alternative put forward to those of 'full partnership' or 'employment' was the consortium of specialists in different fields – for example, lawyers, bankers, town planners, accountants, architects – to operate in a limited specific field of activity such as real property development or estate duty schemes. From an accountancy standpoint, it would seem that such a consortium hardly differs in principle from the management consultancy organizations, including members of several professions, which are already associated with several well-known accountancy practices; nor would they introduce ethical problems which have not already been encountered in that context.

Accountants may well be reluctant to concede the general title of 'solicitors' work' to any functions not specifically reserved to that profession under the Solicitors Acts; but they can hardly deny that the development and enlarged influence of the accountancy profession has been in several respects at the expense of the legal profession. Executorship, trusts, taxation, liquidations, bankruptcy and receivership have all ceased within the past century to be the exclusive prerogative of solicitors. The system of professional education based on articled service which has been maintained throughout its history by (in particular) The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales owes its inspiration, in part if not in entirety, to that of the Law Society. At least one of the early tutors for the examinations of the Institute and of the (then) Society of Incorporated Accountants and Auditors is believed to have been by profession a solicitor. Accountants will also recognize a common problem in the Law Society's concern for the recruitment and practical training of articled clerks, including the availability of suitable principals, and its predilection for graduate entrants.

We have nevertheless some difficulty in accepting without reserve the statement made at the Law Society's conference, that 'accountants [are] concerned only with a section of the population'; and we note with surprise the assertion (attributed to a solicitor from one of the major provincial cities) that 'Accountants normally depended upon a few wealthy clients, whereas solicitors took their remuneration from a wide range of clients, with large sums arising only in matters of house purchase or probate'. There are not a few firms of accountants who would be glad of even one wealthy client, who are content to earn their professional remuneration from a clientele no less diverse than that of the average solicitor (if, indeed, such a person exists), and who by virtue of the Solicitors Acts cannot look to conveyancing or probate business to leaven the lump. Before joint partnerships can hope to achieve reality, let alone to function effectively, there are one or two misconceptions to be dispelled.

Current Affairs

Instant Management Accounting for the Architect

ALMOST seven years after the publication of a report entitled The Architect and his Office – which in its main conclusions stressed that uniform methods of financial control should be developed and spread throughout the architectural profession – the Royal Institute of British Architects has now published what may be called a do-it-yourself manual of Management Accounting for the Architect.

The system has been designed primarily for the smaller private office so 'that the architect can begin, in a fairly simple way, with Part 1 and then progress to Parts 2 and 3 as his accounting methods and grasp of the system become more sophisticated'. Each of the three parts involves the use of standard forms printed on blue, yellow and orange paper. The manual states that when implemented, Part 1 should enable the practitioner to budget expenditure and forecast fees, while Parts 2 and 3 should provide him with the means of keeping a much closer control over work in progress and to calculate the targets and resources for jobs for comparison with the time and money spent.

In its search for simplicity and to 'provide invaluable evidence to support negotiations for a bank overdraft', the manual seems all too easily to gloss over significant references. For example: that once it has been set up the system 'can be operated by a competent secretary or a book-keeper', while elsewhere it would be 'controlled and operated by one partner or by a partner and a confidential secretary'. That because the problems of valuing opening and closing work in progress are 'too complicated' the system is designed on a receipts and payments basis and 'the professional accountants will settle the valuations . . . when preparing the annual balance sheet'. That liquidity forecasting 'must be based on receipts and payments but, in financial accounting, it is income and expenditure which applies'. That fees to be invoiced 'should be sent in during any time up to three months before the date upon which a fee should be received' while the worked examples show fees to be entered in a liquidity statement on the assumption payment is received at an expected time. There is no recommendation for the preparation of interim sets of accounts which are surely necessary, or about the distinct stages of an architect's work; and the manual's directives about the treatment of partners' remuneration can be argued.

Priced £6 10*s*, the manual includes a supply of blank forms to commence the system. The reader is informed that the system was 'drafted by a working group of architects, assisted by a professional accountant' – Mr A. R. Glenton, F.C.A. – and has been subjected to 'extensive field trials', but faced with worked examples, in total involving 64 pieces of paper, the architect will surely need to remember the sentence in the opening paragraph of the preface: 'Success, or even survival, depends on rigorous control of a firm's cash situation and the most economical deployment of its staff' – otherwise it is not unlikely that the volume of data will appear to be daunting.

Nevertheless, it is only fair to say that the RIBA does not regard the manual as the last word on the subject. To revert again to the preface, it is 'presented in the simplest possible way, so that it can be redesigned later in the light of further experience'.

OECD on Fiscal Policy

THE use of fiscal measures to influence the consumer or investor is a commonplace in the modern economies of Western Europe. While most practising accountants hardly share the enthusiasm displayed by economists for fiscal policy, as a means of demand management it is of primary importance. It was hardly accidental that Sir William Armstrong should have devoted his Stamp Memorial lecture to examining post-war UK experience of demand management.

A new OECD publication, Fiscal Policy for a Balanced Economy (HMSO 32*s* 6*d*), reviews the post-war experience of the Western world with fiscal policy as a means of achieving economic growth with low unemployment. The authors – eight economists from Europe and the USA – are impressed with the degree of success that has attended the management of the Western economies compared with pre-war. Reviewing UK experience, the authors conclude that substantial use has been made of fiscal policy as a means of maintaining full employment but, given the complex post-war problems, demand management alone could not resolve them.

As far as budgetary policy is concerned, the report concludes that this has tended, over the period, to reinforce short-term fluctuations in output and employment rather than to correct them. In fact, during the 1960s, demand management seems to have served actually to create such fluctuations.

Reviewing the UK scene, the authors consider that there is a relatively high degree of sophistication in public discussion of budgetary measures, both inside and outside Parliament, which facilitates the acceptance of flexible fiscal policies. They make the point, however, that the lack of effective control of public sector expenditure reduces the flexibility of fiscal and budgetary policy. Furthermore, the extent to which indirect taxes are concentrated on commodities – consumption of which does not vary greatly with changes in consumer incomes – weakens the influence of those taxes as stabilizers.

Of particular interest is the conclusion that the time-lags in the payment of corporate taxes 'remain substantial and tend to produce destabilizing effects'. The authors would like to see the taxation of business profits nearer to a 'pay-as-you-go' basis. They also consider that a shift from the heavily concentrated UK indirect taxes to a more broadly based system would improve the efficiency of discretionary action as well as the response of the fiscal system.

Scottish Institute's New Tax Book

THE Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland has published what it describes as 'a tax book with a difference'. In Direct Taxation in the United Kingdom is brought together 'all the direct taxes so that the structure and principles of direct taxation may be readily appreciated'. Edited by Mr T. D. Lynch, C.A., this 30*s* paperback of some 230 pages comprises a symposium by ten authors, based on papers they prepared for a five-day taxation course in the Scottish Institute's post-qualifying education programme.

Mr Lynch himself has contributed two sections – one on betterment levy and another on share valuation. Not all the contributors are accountants; indeed, one is Mr B. E. V. Sabine, an Inspector of Taxes, who contributes a section on a subject on which he is already a well known expert, namely, the historical development of direct taxation in Britain.

As may be expected in a book stated to have been designed for the practising accountant as well as the tax specialist and the student, the general approach is highly practical. There are some particularly helpful suggestions on close companies by Mr J. C. Craig, C.A., especially in the thorny territory of distributions and shortfall.

Then Mr I. W. Nicholson, B.L., contributes a knowledgeable section on trusts and settlements, though his use of Scottish nomenclature may be a trifle puzzling to some readers south of the border. Particularly apt is the comment in his introduction that present rates of taxation simply drive the taxpayer into making settlements.

In an interesting introduction to death duties (there is only one real death duty now but the author includes capital gains on a death), Mr J. S. MacLeod, C.A., refers to Strathcona v. CIR (8 ATC 233, 410) as being a case about a 'gifted' horse that died. This is not an entirely uncommon misapprehension but it was, in fact, about investments which had increased in value between their being gifted and the donor's death. The horse was merely a figment of the imagination of one of counsel arguing the case. In reviewing the aggregation rules and gifts constituting normal expenditure, Mr MacLeod's text hardly keeps pace with his synopsis of the legislation, in particular, sections 37–38 of the Finance Act 1968. In the latter it is not quite true to say that the new rule about aggregation is restricted in the case of pre-Budget policies; they have, in fact, to be policies on the life of the deceased. Many policies have been given away on the life of the donee and these are fully caught.

But these are, perhaps comparatively minor blemishes which can doubtlessly be put right when the book goes to a second edition – of which there is little doubt with such a useful and forward-looking text.

Investment Allowance on Designs

INVESTMENT allowances, although withdrawn as regards expenditure after January 16th, 1966, continue to provide a fruitful source of litigation between the taxpayer and the Inland Revenue, the latest being the case of McVeigh v. Arthur Sanderson & Sons Ltd before Mr Justice Cross last week.

The company is a manufacturer of wallpaper and furnishing fabrics. Patterns are placed on the wallpaper or fabric either by blocks applied by hand or mechanically, by silk screens to which the patterns had been transferred, or by machines equipped with pattern-bearing rollers. Section 16 of the Finance Act 1954 provided for investment allowance in respect, inter alia, of expenditure on the provision of new machinery or plant, and the Crown conceded that the blocks and screens with the patterns on them were plant and that the pattern rollers were plant and machinery into which they were fitted.

The Crown also conceded that the blocks, screens and rollers, without patterns on them, could play no part in the manufacturing process and would be only inchoate plant and machinery. The Crown granted an allowance on the cost of the unpatterned blocks, screens and rollers, and also the cost of patterning them, but resisted any allowance on the expenditure on the acquisition of the patterns themselves.

The designs were either bought from freelance artists or produced by artists employed by the company. In one year, 1963–64, 155 designs were produced at the company's studios and 326 were bought. Many more designs were bought or produced than were adopted for production, because it was considered essential that the company's styling committee should have a large number from which to select for use. All the designs, used or not, were filed in the company's library and were kept for a minimum of six years. They were capable of registration but were not in fact registered. The company had never sold any designs other than those incorporated in their wallpaper or fabric.

The Special Commissioners held that the company was entitled to investment allowance on the expenditure in question on the ground that the whole of the expenditure attributable to the designs was expenditure 'on the provision of new machinery or plant', within the meaning of section 16.

The Crown appealed to the High Court, and upholding the Special Commissioners' decision, Mr Justice Cross said (according to The Times of December 17th), that two questions arose: first, were the designs themselves 'plant'?; secondly, could the cost of acquiring those designs be said to be expenditure on the provision of the pattern blocks, screens, and rollers?

On the second question, his lordship said that section 16 isolated the provision of the patterned wood block and posed the question 'What did the taxpayers spend on it'? It could be argued that since so many designs were never used, only a part of the expenditure on them should be allowed. But the Crown had argued that not a penny of the design expenditure should be allowed. That could not be right and the Crown's appeal must be dismissed with costs. On the first question as to whether the designs could themselves be plant, his lordship said that that was a decision to be taken by a higher Court.

The Business Statistics Office

THE Business Statistics Office, a new department of the Board of Trade, the setting up of which was noted in The Accountant of December 14th, came into being on Wednesday of this week. As was emphasized at a recent Press conference to mark the opening, this did not imply the waving of a magic wand to produce meaningful statistics. So much depended on the information emanating from industry and its speed of transmission to the BSO. There had been much debate in recent years on the adequacy, or otherwise, of British official statistics and the advantages of a centralized set-up, so steps were taken to implement the centralization, from which it was hoped would emerge an integrated and efficient system.

The new department, under its Director, Mr M. C. Fessey – previously Chief Statistician at the Board of Trade – has a three-fold function: the collection of industrial data; the establishment and maintenance of a Central Register of Businesses; and the development of a 'data bank'. The collection of data will be partially implemented when existing functions of the Board of Trade Census Office is taken over by the Business Statistics Office. Thus the BSO will in future be responsible for the taking of censuses of production and distribution.

The Central Register of Businesses, to be held on a computer, is basically a list of the names and addresses of businesses, classified by industry, size, area, etc., for use in statistical inquiries. In due course the Central Register will replace the registers at present held by different Government departments for conducting statistical inquiries. The collection of all main data on industrial statistics will be concentrated at the BSO and will form a data bank in which information will be stored and can be drawn upon for different purposes.

Geographically the BSO will be developed from the existing Board of Trade Census Office at Eastcote, Middlesex, but it is intended that the new department's permanent location will be Newport, Mon.

The department hopes that the new arrangements will promote the efficient collection and dissemination of business statistics, and that it will help in guarding against duplication and overlapping between inquiries – sentiments which will be whole-heartedly shared by members of the profession and business management who in recent years have experienced more than a little irritation and frustration in the face of the demands of the Government machine. Too often it has been felt that officialdom is apparently oblivious of the mounting cost to industrial and business concerns, in terms of both time and money, in meeting what appears to be its insatiable appetite for statistical information. Anything, therefore, which will foster the spirit of mutual co-operation which the new department hopes will develop is to be welcomed.

THIS IS MY LIFE

by An Industrious Accountant

THE assistant internal auditor looked definitely disgruntled. Tishy, our number two in Costs, had a dogged set to his jaw which looked, to say the least of it, very far from gruntled. There was a feeling of tension in the air.

The root of the problem lay once again in our staff training programme. There just wasn't enough planned training ahead for middle-level accountants, Tishy said sulkily. Just because he was known to attend evening seminars and to listen to lecturers on 'Decimalization' and 'Making budgets stick' and all that 'bull' (his phrase, not mine), he grumbled, his immediate superior hadn't put his name down for that residential management course that all the personnel assistants were clamouring to go to.

The assistant internal auditor was equally bitter. All the salesmen were going on courses, he protested, ever since the managing director had given that lecture on 'Marketing for survival' to the local Rotary Club. They demanded to be sent to two-day and three-day courses on 'Promotional campaigns' and 'Field force strategy'; and their manager, Scotty, had even managed to wheedle the MD into granting an extra £1,000 on their training budget to match their mounting ambitions. What about us? he complained. What about the forgotten army? Why not 'Management psychology' or 'Executive motivation' for accountants?

It seemed pointless to explain that in my own youth we rarely experienced such stratospheric exhortations. We used to sit on hard chairs listening to honest but uninspired practitioners talking about the comparative demerits of 'straight-line' versus 'diminishing-balance' depreciation or asking whether Schedule A should be abolished. Nobody ever mentioned 'Communications in the textile industry' or 'Efficiency via the thorny path of delegation'. The present generation of the profession really were wanting it soft.

I must have said something of this nature, despite my good intentions, because my two young colleagues exchanged momentary but meaningful side-glances and gave a faint indication of gazing resignedly into outer space. This left me with the alternatives of either saying that our policy was inflexible, on the Medes and Persians style, or else asking them, equally meaningfully, if they had considered moving to other jobs recently. I chose a third option, however; I asked them courteously what in hard fact would they like to suggest.

At this they came to life, pulled up their chairs and eagerly produced a glossy brochure. It had pictures of an ancient country house set in lovely gardens; of intent groups listening keenly to donnish types beside wall-charts, and of other gay, sports-coated groups drinking in an old Tudor bar.

The course fees seemed shockingly exorbitant. The organizers, however, as listed on the inside cover of the booklet, seemed to be distinguished by aristocratic lineage, military rank or erudite intellectual titles, so perhaps the fees were reasonable after all. It depended fundamentally on the pay-off in increased efficiency, of course, but I would personally have preferred to see more practical accountants and fewer professors on their panel.

Still, the aim was to optimize training, so we leafed through the booklet. It highlighted such esoteric wonders as 'productivity bargaining', 'management of data processing sections', and 'interviewing success techniques'. There, said Tishy proudly, lay the road to success! Accountant though he is, I noticed that he in turn saw the outside skills as his signposts on the road.

There wasn't any particular difficulty involved in developing the idea because, in fact, our training programme, having got bogged down owing to influenza, storm and flood, was still open to amendment. So, subject to further discussion with their superiors, I agreed to let the aspirants have their heads.

Take-over Tally – 1968

by R. W. MOON, B.Litt., F.C.A.

LAST year was a remarkable year for mergers and take-overs. In value terms those announced in the first two months of the year alone beat the previous year's record by a handsome margin. Then, towards the end of the year, came the surprise announcement that Unilever and Allied Breweries were negotiating terms for a truly massive merger.

If any further evidence were needed of the 'urge to merge' within British industry, the list of major bids and mergers shown in the table below provides ample proof of the process of regrouping which has taken place during the year. Indeed, the total for the year could well exceed £3,000 million. This is three times as high as the previous record year (1967) and not far short of the total amount spent on acquisitions during the preceding six years.

Another milestone will soon be reached because the total number of bids and mergers recorded since 1954 (when the Board of Trade first published statistics on company acquisitions) is rapidly approaching the 10,000 mark, of which about 1,000 are quoted companies, the rest being unquoted.

Nor is this the full story since the official statistics exclude quoted companies whose main interests are in agriculture, shipping, insurance, banking, finance and property, as well as those operating wholly or mainly overseas. Moreover, acquisitions by unquoted public companies and the half million or so private companies are still an unknown quantity.

The dominant feature of the year was the unusual number of very large mergers, particularly among banks, insurance and property companies, which rather overshadowed the almost non-stop stream of industrial mergers and take-overs that in any other year might have captured the headlines.

Contesting the terms

Although the majority of bids go through unopposed, there have been some hard fought battles during the year. Sometimes the opening offer is rejected by the directors as inadequate and better terms are extracted as a result of a spirited defence. For instance, Croda-Premier finally gained control of British Glues & Chemicals at the fourth attempt for £9 million (against an opening offer worth £5 million). Then, in October, the Rank Organisation won their long, drawn-out battle with Strand Electric with a £5·6 million offer, after being rebuffed three times in succession in May when the first offer was no more than £4¼ million. Meanwhile, Princes Foods were busily fending off a £2·6 million bid from J. Bibby but finally capitulated when the offer price reached £3¼ million.

*Market capitalization. † Subject to acceptance. ‡ A higher bid is now being made by Metropolitan Estate & Property Corporation.

In all these cases, the interests of the shareholders were well protected by the vigorous counter-attacks mounted by the directors in conjunction with their financial advisers.

More often, however, the offer price is raised due to the intervention of a second or third contestant. Thus, a regular 'Dutch auction' developed for control of T. F. Firth & Sons, the carpet firm, between the Guthrie Corporation and Readicut International, which the latter won at the fourth time of asking with a final bid of £10 million (against Guthrie's opening bid of £7·7 million). Then, Dunlop and Turner & Newall vied with one another for George Angus, pushing the price up by £10 million to £32 million before Dunlop ran out the winner.

After making a bid of £19·5 million for Rawlplug, Minerals Separation dropped out of the hunt after Burmah Oil came in with a higher offer (£23 million) which found favour in the eyes of Rawlplug's directors. Elsewhere, Johnson & Slater finally yielded to Doulton at the third offer worth £2·1 million, after a running battle with Armitage Ware when the starting price was no more than £1·2 million.

Lastly, Viyella, Robert Kitchen Taylor and J. H. Buckingham were involved in a three-cornered contest for control of Welch Margetson – which ultimately fell to Viyella for just over £1 million (against an initial bid worth £700,000).

The pattern of mergers

Rationalization is the mainspring of most industrial bids and mergers and many horizontal mergers have taken place in the food industry, viz.: Associated British Foods – Allied Farm Foods; J. Bibby – Princes Foods; Brooke Bond – Liebigs; Ranks Hovis McDougall – Cerebos; Reckitt & Colman – Colemans (Wincarnis); Schweppes – Typhoo Tea; Tesco – Victor Value. As for the pharmaceutical industry, Boots and Beechams are currently in the limelight with rival bids for Horlicks, while earlier in the year Glaxo absorbed Farley's Infant Foods.

The same trend is noticeable in sand, gravel and road-making materials (e.g. Ready-mixed Concrete – Hall & Ham River; a triple merger between Tarmac, Derbyshire Stone and William Briggs), while a mining group, Consolidated Gold Fields, added to its acquisition of Greenwoods (St Ives) in 1967 by bidding £2·9 million for three small sand and gravel firms before absorbing Amalgamated Roadstone.

Pottery and sanitary-ware have also exhibited much the same trend (Doulton – Minton; Doulton – Johnson & Slater; Wedgwood – Johnson Brothers; H. & R. Johnson – Richards – Campbell), while some regrouping has taken place in the brick industry (London Brick – Marston Valley).

In textiles, Courtaulds has again been to the fore in its efforts to control a significant share of the textile processors. Nine more acquisitions were recorded by them (Clutsom-Penn, Northgate Group, Prew-Smith, H. Lister, M. Duke, Sir Thomas & Arthur Wardle, Contour Hosiery, Ashton Brothers and Moygashel). At the same time, Courtaulds took the first steps in bringing about a regrouping of the paint industry by bidding for International Paints through its own paint subsidiary, Pinchin Johnson & Associates.

Diversification is another prime cause of take-overs. Here, Imperial Tobacco led the way, adding to its existing food interests by taking over National Canning, while Lindustries broke into the rubber and plastics industry through its purchase of William Warne Holdings for £6·7 million.

As for 'special situations', Slater Walker Securities have been particularly active with bids for Drages, Crittall-Hope (£18 million), TWW (£6·2 million), Augustine Investments (£5½ million) and Harrison Opticians (£3·4 million). Augustine Investments happens to own the Hudson Verity group of opticians which added to Dolland & Aitchison which formed part of TWW, and Harrison Opticians, gives Slater Walker nearly 8 per cent of the UK optics market.

While at home the swing away from all cash offers has continued – share offers with or without an element of loan stock seem to have made all the running stimulated, no doubt, by rising share prices – the exact opposite applies with foreign bids because they have to be all-cash under a Treasury ruling. Consent is also required under the Exchange Control Act 1947 for the transfer of securities by UK residents to persons resident outside the sterling area, and to any action whereby a company controlled by UK residents passes out of such control.

There have been several such foreign bids during the year, including the American Tobacco Company's partial bid for Gallahers, and Philip Morris's (the unsuccessful contender for Gallaher) bid for Godfrey Phillips.

Later in the year, Studebaker-Worthington Inc made an all-cash offer of £10 million for Worthington-Simpson – a company in which it already had a 10 per cent stake[1], while Leasco World Trade Co bid £4 million cash for Inbucon. On a much smaller scale, American Metal Climax bid £1·4 million for Minworth Holdings.

Repatriation of British-owned minority holdings was the reason behind the Swedish giant, SKF's acquisition of the 40 per cent minority interest in the Skefco Ball Bearing Co for £6 million cash.

However, foreign bids are by no means all one-way traffic. For example, at the beginning of the year Allied Breweries purchased a Dutch brewery group – D' Orangeboom – for nearly £6 million and followed this up with another deal worth £10 million when it acquired N.V. Bierbronwery, so making it the second biggest brewery in the Netherlands. Then, right at the end of the year, British-American Tobacco bought the US based cosmetics firm – Germaine Monteil – for £15 million (thereby adding to its existing interests in Yardley, Lentheric and Morny).

[1] A higher bid is on the way from the Weir group.

The defence prevails

In order to redress the balance mention must be made of the comparatively few bids that failed. If the offer is judged too low or shareholders consider that prospects are brighter if they 'go it alone', the bid will lapse. Three examples spring to mind: the usual cause – insufficient acceptances – led to Unilever's withdrawal from their bid for Smith & Nephew and, for the same reasons, Newton Chambers yielded to Jeyes and Dufay Bitumastic to International Paints (though the latter was subsequently taken over by Courtaulds).

In each case the board of directors recommended rejection and resorted to the now familar tactics of forecasting higher profits and promising an increased ordinary dividend (one of the very few situations where the Treasury is prepared to relax its ban on annual dividend increases above 3½ per cent).

In December, the loyalty of its many small shareholders enabled Butlins to fend off an unwelcome £46 million bid by Phonographic Equipment. As it happens, the latter will be holding on to the 11 per cent stake in Butlins' equity acquired by its merchant bankers in the course of market dealings.

Monopolies

The Monopolies and Mergers Act 1965 is scarcely three and a half years old. In that time fewer than 300 mergers have been screened by the Board of Trade and all but eight of them have been given clearance; the remaining eight were referred to the Monopolies Commission for investigation and report.

Two such references were made in 1968; the first concerned the proposed merger between Barclays, Lloyds and Martins Banks (which was subsequently disallowed on the grounds that it could restrict competition and lead to a 'two bank' system among the clearing banks in this country). The second concerned the proposed take-over of Radio Rentals by Thorn Electrical Industries (which was allowed to go through unimpeded).

Influence of the IRC

Under its new managing director, Mr C. H. Villiers, the Industrial Reorganization Corporation appears to be taking a more active part in influencing not only the pace of industrial mergers but also their direction. First, it played a typical 'behind the scenes' role in the British Motor Holdings merger with Leyland Motors early in January, besides making £25 million available on loan to the new holding company for future expansion.

Next it gave official backing to British Oxygen's £3½ million bid for Edwards High Vacuum. Then, under its watchful and approving eye, Holman Brothers and Broom & Wade agreed terms for a merger of the two companies, thereby strengthening the British compressed air industry.

In August, it gave full support to the union of Davy-Ashmore and Armstrong Whitworth (Metal Industries), but the proposed merger between three boiler-makers (John Thompson, International Combustion and Clarke Chapman) which received the IRC's blessing, ultimately broke down; so the search for a second nuclear power group continues.

Earlier, the IRC intervened in the battle between the Rank Organisation and George Kent for control of Cambridge Instrument. In the end, the active help of the IRC just tipped the scales in George Kent's favour, Ranks finally withdrawing, only to turn their attention to the acquisition of another firm in the scientific instrument field – Hilger & Watts.

The IRC action in backing a George Kent bid by buying more than a million shares in Cambridge Instrument and taking an underwriting obligation to provide Kent with a further £2¾ million raised questions of principle, particularly as in this case the lower of the two competing offers happened to gain the day.

Any interference with the free play of the market by a powerful new agency set up with £150 million of Government money, or any enforced merger put through on the grounds of 'industrial strategy', is bound to cause concern in the City.

Although reorganization of the pump industry is thought to be under active consideration, the IRC made no attempt to take sides in the battle for Harland Engineering between the Weir Group and Mather & Platt (where the latter finally withdrew, conceding victory to the £5 million Weir bid) but did signify its approval to the £2 million take-over of Plenty & Son by Sigmund Pulsometer Pumps (a subsidiary of Booker McConnell).

Lastly, the IRC gave its firm support to the giant GEC – English Electric link-up, which came hard on the heels of a surprise opening bid for English Electric by Plessey.

The City Code

The City Take-over Code came into effect on March 27th, 1968. But the new code – like its predecessors – still lacks the power of sanctions and little more than eight months later its whole future seemed to lie in the balance.

First, the Panel's inept handling of the American Tobacco Company's partial bid for Gallahers in May followed in November by its long delayed reaction to the questionable methods employed in the struggle for control of the News of the World Organization Ltd, lent support to those who have long advocated a statutory body to take the place of the present voluntary policing system.

Here, the tangled skein of events began in the middle of October with a £26 million bid by the Pergamon Press. It is due to reach its climax just after this issue goes to press when the shareholders vote for or against the deal with Mr Rupert Murdoch's Australian News Ltd whereby certain of its magazine, newspaper and publishing interests would be injected into N.o.W. against an allotment of shares equivalent to 35 per cent of the increased voting capital. The London Stock Exchange banned dealings in the N.o.W. shares as far back as October 25th (they only resumed on December 19th following the release of the terms of the agreement with News Ltd) in order to give shareholders time to assess the relative merits of the Pergamon bid and the N.o.W. blocking deal with News Ltd.

As soon as dealings were resumed, the Stock Exchange and the Take-over Panel announced that News Ltd, N.o.W. and Pergamon had agreed not to intervene in the reopened market but this was rather like locking the stable door after the horse had bolted because all three parties or their financial advisers had engaged in market operations long before dealings were banned. (The Panel had already 'neutralized' 15 per cent of the voting equity acquired by Hambro's.) Meanwhile opposition to the proposed deal with News Ltd has been steadily building up and finally came to a head when trustees, acting for shareholders commanding 25 per cent of the N.o.W. voting shares, took out a High Court writ against N.o.W., News Ltd and Hambros Bank seeking a series of injunctions restraining implementation of agreements made with News Ltd.

All the way through, the Panel has been unduly hesitant in its retaliatory moves.

By all accounts, the voluntary system has been granted a reprieve but only on one condition – that the Panel is strengthened and the rules are revised. Unless the City sees fit to regulate itself, a statutory body is bound to be imposed in the end with all its attendant frustrations and inflexibilities.

Conclusion

In the relentless search for the economies of scale, fragmentation in British industry is slowly giving way to the concept of larger and more professionally managed firms. In the years ahead, management's ability to organize and direct these larger units will undoubtedly be tested to the full.

Even so, the 1968 record may well remain unbroken for some time to come, now that the door has been closed once more to further mergers among the clearing banks.

Management Education in Canada

by DOUGLAS GARBUTT, A.C.I.S., A.C.W.A., Dip.Ed.

DEVELOPMENT of the Canadian economy has been based largely on the immense natural resources and the country is an important source of raw materials for the United States in particular. A large part of the investment in Canadian industry is owned by the United States, with the United Kingdom a poor second. However, industrial production developed in the 1940s under the impact of war and the Government has tried to keep a more balanced economic development since then. But it is still true that the highest wages and the fastest rate of growth are in the field of mining.

The country is three thousand miles across but the bulk of its population lives within a narrow belt above the border with the United States which is rarely 200 miles deep and is often much less. The population is about 20 million, of which about eight million are gainfully employed, and it has been estimated that there are about 200,000 managers. In these terms the country is half the size of the UK, although in terms of land area it is the second largest in the world.

Canada is a fascinating blend of American and Anglo-Scottish attitudes. Despite the long dependence of the economy on America as a supplier of raw materials, the tradition of the Scottish immigrants is still very strong. The pubs close on Sundays and the crowds in Toronto's underground system behave with all the stoic reserve of the Londoner in the tube. The supermarkets tend to dominate retailing, as they do in the United States, but more of their products are familiar brands from the United Kingdom.

What one might expect from this is that Canadian management would have been very much on the American model and that management education would be similar and extensively developed. However, the facts are otherwise. The Canadians seem to have enjoyed as much of a seller's market after the Second World War as did the United Kingdom, and to have been just as surprised as were the British by the emergence of active competition from the Germans, the French, and – in their case – the United Kingdom.

There is some evidence that the Canadians are favourably impressed by the quality of European and British management almost as much as that of American management. This is partly due to the influx of highly-educated immigrants from these countries since the war.

The Vice-President of the Northern Electric Company has put the point in this way:

> 'It has been so easy and so tempting for the Canadians to borrow from their neighbours, that we have seldom had the initiative or taken the trouble to seek original solutions to our problems. We have been fat cats, sitting comfortably on the back of the American Hercules, enjoying the fruits of his labour and at the same time deluding ourselves into thinking that we have really earned those benefits. This is one of the most serious problems facing Canada and Canadian corporations today.'

It would appear that the awareness of the need for improved industrial management became evident in the 1950s and a number of organizations, including the universities, Government, business training and professional associations, became interested in providing management training.

Co-ordination and direction

The Canadian Industrial Management Association goes back to 1947 when it superseded the Society of Industrial Method Engineers which had been founded in 1942. The national office is in Toronto but the association, like many Canadian associations, is on a Federal basis and the national office provides co-ordination and direction in implementing the national policy, but it works through independent organizations in each province.

The association was chartered as an independent educational organization by the province of Ontario in 1956 and was granted authority to conduct courses in the field of industrial management. In addition to regular meetings and seminars run by branches, the association publishes a journal, the Industrial Manager, and it makes the management abstracts published by the British Institute of Management available to its members. The journal is an interesting and useful publication, and the association is making efforts to raise its standards even higher.

The basic course presented by the association leads to the designation CIM – Certified Industrial Manager. It consists of four sections of 24 evening sessions and it is designed primarily for the junior executive and senior supervisor. It covers business organization and accounting principles in the first year; engineering, economics and industrial engineering in the second year; manufacturing controls and marketing in the third year; and industrial relations and cases and problems in administration in the fourth year.

In fact, the scope is similar to the Institute of Industrial Administration in the United Kingdom which merged with the BIM shortly after the Second World War.

One problem which the association has is that its members tend to lose interest after they have obtained the CIM qualification and they are just in the process of developing a post-certificate course in management. This post-graduate course is a three-year course, again offering two sections each year as with the certificate course. It does not confer a specific designation at the moment; the subjects are economics and financial management in the first year; industry and Government and administrative behaviour, second year; information systems and business policy in the third year.

The scattered nature of the country has led a number of universities to develop correspondence courses, some of which carry recognition by professional bodies. The University of Toronto, for instance, offers correspondence courses which are accepted by such bodies as the Chartered Institute of Secretaries and the Association of Professional Engineers of Ontario; this, perhaps, is a timely reminder that such courses may be of value in closing gaps in educational provision in some circumstances.

The University Extension Department of the University of Toronto also provides business and professional courses to cater for the examinations of the Canadian Industrial Management Association, the Institute of Canadian Bankers, the Administrative Management Society, the Ontario Society of Training and Development, the Personnel Association of Toronto, etc. It appears that it is still not possible to get an undergraduate degree in business in Toronto but there is a graduate programme in business administration as well as the certificate course in the University extension programme.

At the undergraduate level the University Extension offers a certificate course in business. The programme consists of six subjects in the field of business of which three, namely, accounting, economics, and business organization are compulsory. Optional subjects include data processing, business finance, law, marketing, personnel, production, and statistics. A student may enroll for no more than two subjects in any one year and instruction is given in two-hour sessions in the evenings of a 25-week year. These courses are acceptable to the Institution of Industrial Accountants and provide preparation toward their examinations.

The graduate programme at Toronto University is offered by its School of Business which has a faculty of 14, plus seven special lecturers in areas such as finance, accounting, etc. The school offers two graduate programmes in business administration – a master's degree and a diploma course. The former is a two-year course and the latter is a full or part-time one-year course.

Developing administrative skills

The general aims of the courses are to enable the student to acquire principles, theories, concepts and ideas that have proved useful or which show potential in formulating administrative questions and solving administrative problems. They aim to develop administrative skills, such as the capacity for recognizing issues and diagnosing problems, or posing relevant questions and the ability to reach objective decisions, either alone or in co-operation with others. The course also aims to develop the capacity for communicating ideas in small and large groups, orally and through the written word.

The school employs a variety of instructional methods. Besides lectures and reading, research and case assignments there are seminars, laboratory periods and industrial tours. Emphasis is upon lecture and classroom discussions and the students' preparation for them, but the school is not limited to particular instructional methods.

Recognizing the value of research in education, the second year work for the MBA involves preparation of a dissertation, and highly qualified students are permitted to choose a research project in their advanced work. Admission is for graduates only and there appears to be no provision for professionally qualified men to enter the MBA programme. Candidates must also take the Princeton Test.

The master's programme comprises the following half subjects: economics of enterprise; economic environment and business; business finance; production; marketing; statistics for business decisions; business information systems; and either operations analysis or quantitative methods. In addition, accounting and introduction to administration courses are taken as full subjects. Exemptions are available for students who have been granted advanced standing from some of the courses in the first-year programme.

In the second year, the student takes five subjects and the dissertation. The subjects include business strategy; economics and business policy; administrative accounting; financial information; financial market and investments analysis; production management; operations analysis; marketing management; marketing research; marketing communications; management of human resources; selected problems in industrial relationships; management relationships; human relationships and the industrial community; organization of behaviour; statistical methods for business and industry; business forecasting.

Grading system

The grading system is on the English style, with the first-year student required to obtain at least 'C' standing in each subject and an average of at least 66 per cent of the aggregate marks. Students who fail to obtain the required standing in one subject will be required to repeat it. Students who obtain the required 66 per cent but failed to obtain standing in one subject or two half-subjects are permitted to register for the second year whilst repeating the failed subject or subjects. To obtain a degree a student must obtain these standings in each subject in the second year and in the dissertation. All requirements must be completed within four years from the date of the first enrolment in the second-year programme.

The diploma course is usually the same as the first year of the MBA course but it is available both on the full- and part-time basis. The general requirement of entry is the same as the master's course, except that candidates with marginally below second-class honours degrees, may be admitted on the evidence of their potential ability in the field. Normally this is obtained from the Princeton Test. In exceptional cases, other factors such as graduate courses taken elsewhere and relevant business experience will be considered. Applicants with less than third-class honours degrees will not be admitted to the course.

The University has a number of fellowships available to students of the Business School with a value of up to $5,000 for one year and they also offer loans which are financed by a number of companies, such as the Ford Motor Company, Massey-Ferguson Ltd, and the Canadian Industrial Management Association. Repayment commences one year after graduation, from which date interest at 3 per cent is charged. The school, also, has an emergency loan fund.

Common feature

Another opening for graduate students is to work as assistants in the correction of reports. Or they may work on supervising the library in the evening. Such work carries pay of up to $500 a year, depending on the type of work undertaken. This, of course, is a common feature of the American universities – that graduate students are able to find some type of academic work to undertake. As a consequence professors have available a number of graduate student hours of work on such chores as marking scripts, supervising examinations, etc.

One of the earliest long-term management education courses in Canada, and one of the best known, is the University of Western Ontario MBA course, based on the Harvard model and drawing directly on Harvard staff for much of their teaching. The first graduate courses were offered in 1932 and a separate School of Business Administration was founded in 1949.

From the start, it had strong support from Canadian businessmen and the MBA programme in the first year comprises a core of required courses in production, marketing, finance, control, administrative practices, quantitative analysis and economic environments of business.

In the second year, students are required to take a course in policy and they may then continue with more advanced broad study, including arts and science subjects, or if they prefer they may specialize in one field.

Since 1960 this school has also offered a Ph.D. programme in business administration – the first of its kind in Canada. The course aims to provide prospective teachers and researchers and only a limited number of students are admitted.

The school benefits not only from strong financial support from business but also from contacts, visits and case studies which are used in the teaching. Many leading executives also lecture on the courses and their companies accept students on an internship basis during the long vacation between the two years of the MBA programme.

Other schools and university departments in Montreal and British Columbia have a good standing and are developing along their own lines.

One feature of the Canadian scene which resembles the situation in the United Kingdom is that there is a large number of overlapping, and even competing, institutions in the field of management. In the early 1950s an attempt was made to provide some coordinating nucleus in the formation of a Canadian management council. Unfortunately this did not succeed; it appears never to have satisfactorily defined its purpose or to have found sufficient support from industry.

In an attempt to tidy up the situation, the Federal Department of Labour convened a symposium on Management Education and Training in Quebec, in May 1964, when fifty individuals took part in a two-day seminar in which the problem for all areas in Canada was considered. The conclusion of this symposium was that the ad hoc Canadian council of management associations which had largely planned the gathering, would accept the mandate for further action on the road to national co-ordination.

Fifteen societies and organizations in the management and other adult education fields accordingly got together and formed the Canadian Council of Management Associations. In 1965 the chairmanship of this association passed to the President of the Canadian Industrial Management Association.

To sum up, although there is much evidence of growing interest in and the provision of management education in Canada, it is evident that developments are probably behind those of the United Kingdom, let alone those of the United States. This is not a comment on the quality of work in individual institutions, but merely to echo the conviction of many Canadians themselves, that in view of the needs, much still remains to be done.

Decimalization and the Computer

by P. E. HOOK, A.A.C.C.A., A.M.B.I.M., M.B.C.S.

WHEN the problems of decimalization in relation to machinery are discussed the emphasis is invariably laid on the obvious, clearly recognizable difficulties of replacing 12-teethed cog-wheels and sixpenny-sized slots. In the midst of the welter of worry as to whether the manufacturers will keep to their conversion schedule the computer, which needs no mechanical alteration, is hardly considered. There are problems in changing to decimal working – and most data processing managers admit it that they have a note on their work schedule to look at them after current development programs have been cleared – but often they cannot foresee any real difficulties and usually the computer manufacturers are being relied upon to come up with software packages to handle the conversions.

Is there really a problem in going decimal with computers? If so, how long will it take to overcome it? It would be very satisfying to give a clear-cut, universal answer to those questions. Unfortunately, this is not possible. It depends on a large number of factors which vary from installation to installation.

Factors affecting the decimalization problem

The extent of the decimal problem in a computer installation is dependent on:

(a) the manufacturer in respect to the hardware and the 'official' software he has provided; and

(b) the user in regard to the 'unofficial' software and the applications programs he has written.

Programs now being written for running with standard software on third-generation computers should cause the least trouble, inasmuch as any reputable manufacturer will accept responsibility for any modifications that may be necessary to permit the system to accept input and produce output in decimal rather than sterling currency. These modifications may be to hardware or to software, where, for instance, the manufacturer has provided sterling routines as part of the operating software.

The user will be responsible for deciding his policy on change-over, i.e., to what extent he keeps a dual currency system during the transition period. This decision, which must take into account the timing of the manufacturer's modifications, will affect input/output routines, programs for sorting and processing the data, and the composition of files.

The structuring of files is itself dependent on the type of storage device, e.g., tapes or discs, and the facilities afforded by the programming language chosen and the operating system. The user is, of course, also responsible for the design of forms and stationery to cover the transition from sterling to decimal, including dual currency where appropriate.

So much for future programs on the current range of equipment, although it may not be amiss to point out that the adequacy of manufacturers' software assistance varies considerably, even on machinery now being installed.

The real trouble area consists of the large number of obsolete computers installed at present, many of which are not due to be replaced until well after Decimalization Day. Here a multitude of problems can arise, depending on the manufacturer, the vintage of the computer and the enterprise and discipline of past programmers. The following examples illustrate some of the aspects involved.

Type of computer: According to a reliable source, at the end of June 1968 there were about 2,800 computers installed in the UK. Over 90 models were included, most of them no longer in current production. About 800 to 1,000 systems may face problems of hardware and/or software.

Manufacturers: British computer manufacturers have undergone numerous take-overs and mergers within the last few years. For example, ICL are now responsible for such diverse machines as EMI 1100, Leo III, ICT (RCA) 1500, English Electric KDF6 and Ferranti Atlas.

Data base: Some computers read data in sterling and have inbuilt hardware which converts to binary or to decimal pence for processing and storage purposes. Others do the same by software programming. It was quite common for programmers to develop their own special software routines which performed conversions more rapidly or in less core space than those provided by the manufacturers. These routines became embodied in the programs and, regrettably, far too often, these programs were not documented properly. As a result it will now require an expert to locate these conversions and modify them, avoiding side effects. Yet other computers performed arithmetical calculations in sterling or by looking up tables in their memory.

Programming language: Nowadays it is the fashion to write programs in readily-comprehensible 'high level' languages, such as COBOL or PL/1. This was not so with second generation computers, where low-level assembler languages were used, less comprehensible, requiring more programmer training skill – skill which is relatively difficult to find now to carry out program amendments.

Core size: The older computers tend to be severely restricted in the size of 'core' or 'main memory' and hence the size of program that can be performed. This could prove a serious restriction in any area where it is deemed necessary to perform in both sterling and decimal currencies, and it may, in fact, prove impossible to run such programs.

Inexact conversions: Depending on company policy and auditing requirements, provision may have to be made for fractions of new pence and official conversion tables may have to be stored and looked up – perhaps different tables for banking and normal business transactions.

How to evaluate the problem

Such are the variations from one computer installation to another that no set formula can be adopted; each installation must be evaluated individually along the following lines:

(1) Investigate very thoroughly all aspects of the existing installation and programs and establish in detail the extent of the conversion task.
(2) Check whether the conversion load will be increased by the addition of work at present performed by other means, such as accounting machines or punched-card equipment. (It has been given as fact at decimalization seminars, that companies are deferring decisions about replacing accounting machines on the grounds that the work can always be transferred to the computer.)
(3) Analyse the results of the investigation in terms of the operative unit, e.g., systems analyst, programmer, manufacturer, and the time required for implementation.
(4) Review the resources available and their other commitments.
(5) Assess the economies of:
  (i) proceeding with conversion;
  (ii) re-analysing and rewriting the suites of programs concerned;
  (iii) changing the computer.
(6) Schedule the conversion or rewriting, allowing slack to handle unforeseen contingencies. (Networking, incorporating resource planning methods, can be of great assistance.) If it is decided to change the computer, make provision for the selection and delivery of a new model and the retraining of staff. With D-Day in February 1971, there is little time for feasibility studies, retraining, recruiting and computer installation even if work starts right away.
(7) Hold frequent progress meetings and if a network is used, keep it up to date and watch closely for critical areas.

When to start the investigation

The only advice that can be given as to the date on which to start this work is: NOW! One of the best-organized groups of companies in Britain, with over £4 million invested in computers, networked all aspects of decimalization and decided that all computer policy decisions had to be taken by November 30th, 1968. Admittedly, its problems are complex but against that it has a large and experienced staff to handle them. Organizations with smaller and less flexible resources may find their position is relatively worse. It is therefore very necessary to investigate now.

What conclusions can be drawn? The most basic one is that there is no universal solution. Next, that for many computer installations the problem of decimalization, like an iceberg, is far larger than it appears to be. Third, that computer manufacturers – who are in business to sell their hardware – will provide such support as is economically viable to maintain goodwill, but are unlikely to be sympathetic about models they discontinued years ago or machines which were acquired second-hand from other sources. Fourth, that the demand for programmers and programming services considerably exceeds supply, even without the added burden of reprogramming for decimalization, and that neither software houses nor bureaux are likely to be in a position to help out in an emergency. Lastly, that it behoves all managements to make sure now that they are taking the right course of action and that they have the resources available to meet their conversion plan.

Overseas Company Tax Rates

The following table sets out the latest known rates of tax chargeable on the income of companies by the countries listed. Where tax is charged at varying rates, or more than one tax is levied, as much detail is given as space permits. Taxes, tax surcharges ('local') levied on the income of companies by or for provinces, municipalities, etc., are mentioned, unless they are an insignificant part of the tax charge. Special rates for particular types of company or companies carrying on particular trades are not mentioned. Rates shown for non-resident companies refer to branch profits, and are given only where they differ from the usual rates.

Every care has been taken in the preparation of the table, but its accuracy cannot be guaranteed. The table, compiled by the Board of Inland Revenue Library (Foreign Section), is Crown copyright and is reproduced by permission of the Controller of HM Stationery Office.

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Hume v. Asquith

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
November 21st, 1968
(Before Mr Justice Pennycuick)

Income tax – Sums received from copyrights in plays – Copyrights bequeathed to taxpayer – Whether royalties taxable – Inclusive representation rights assigned to a company – Whether sums received from company taxable – Rights rented to United States company – Whether sums received from that company assessable on taxpayer – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 131 (Case III), 132 (Case V), 169, 170 – Finance Act 1960, section 32.

Sir James Barrie bequeathed all his rights in all his plays, other than Peter Pan, to Lady Cynthia Asquith. Sir James had made royalty agreements with a United Kingdom company in respect of two of his plays. In 1944 Lady Cynthia assigned two-thirds of the rights of representation by amateur performers in certain specified plays to a United Kingdom company. The agreement excluded the United States and Canada. In 1949 Lady Cynthia assigned certain rights in some of the plays to a company resident in America. Under the 1944 and 1949 agreements respectively Lady Cynthia received percentages of all fees received by the two companies.

In June 1953, Lady Cynthia assigned the copyright in one of the plays to the taxpayer, Mr Simon Asquith, subject to the agreements with the two companies; and in the same month she assigned to him and to his brother, Mr M. H. Asquith, the copyright in another play, subject again to the two agreements with the companies. The profits of the United Kingdom company in each year in question were greater than the sums paid to the respondent. The profits of the American company were not known.

Tax not having been deducted from the payments under any of the agreements, assessments under Case III of Schedule D were made on the taxpayer for 1953–54 to 1959–60 in respect of the royalties under the agreement made by Sir James (the type A receipts), the sums received under the agreement with the United Kingdom company (the type B receipts) and the sums received under the agreement with the American company (the type C royalties). The Inland Revenue contended (1) that as the type A royalties were received otherwise than by the playwright or his personal representative, they were assessable on the recipient, in that the royalty contract was itself a source of income; (2) that the position as to the type B receipts was the same, and, alternatively, that on the facts those receipts should have been attributed to capital; (3) that the type C receipts were assessable pursuant to section 170 of the Income Tax Act 1952.

It was contended for the taxpayer (1) that the type A receipts were in relation to him, as they had been in relation to Sir James, non-taxable items covered by the decisions in Purchase v. Stainer's Executors and Carson v. Cheyney's Executor; (2) that the type B receipts were within section 169 of the Income Tax Act 1952, and that no attribution of them to capital could be assumed; (3) that as to the type C receipts there was no evidence of discovery to support the first two assessments, and, alternatively, that these receipts should be treated as sums from which United Kingdom tax had been deducted.

The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the taxpayer in respect of the type A receipts on the ground that they retained in his hands the character they had had in relation to Sir James Barrie. The Special Commissioners also decided in the taxpayer's favour in relation to the type B receipts, in that they were subject to deduction of tax under section 169 of the 1952 Act, which forbade assessment of the recipient. The Special Commissioners decided that the type C receipts were assessable on the taxpayer for the reason that these receipts were within section 170 of the 1952 Act, and as tax had not been deducted by the payer, the recipient was assessable under Case III.

Held: the Special Commissioners' decisions were correct.

Burdge v. Pyne

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
November 22nd, 1968
(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Club proprietor – Card-playing with members – Whether winnings part of club profits – Income Tax Act 1952, Schedule D, Case I.

The taxpayer owned and managed a club with the usual facilities such as a bar, dancing, cabaret, fruit machines, roulette and a card-room. Club members and their guests could use the card-room; a fee was charged for admission to that room. During 1965 the only game played in the card-room was three-card brag, and the taxpayer played this game with members of the club when he was not superintending the other activities of the club, and he was almost always successful.

The taxpayer was assessed in the sum of £2,054, less capital allowance, for 1966–67 in respect of his trade as the club's proprietor. He contended that £1,410 18*s* included in the £2,054 represented winnings at three-card brag; that as there was a cash shortage of the business for the period ended December 31st, 1965, a balancing figure of £1,410 18*s* had to be included in the club takings; and that the £1,410 18*s* was not taxable. There was no record, however, of that sum in any of the books of account. The profit and loss account showed a profit of £1,805.

It was contended for the Revenue that it had not been established that the £1,410 18*s* represented winnings at card-playing; and, in the alternative, that if the sum did represent such winnings, it was a part of the receipts of the business.

The General Commissioners decided that the card-playing was carried on as a commercial undertaking; that the taxpayer's winnings were part of the regular receipts of the club; and that the £1,410 18*s* had been properly included in the assessment.

Held: the General Commissioners' decision was correct.

Finance and Commerce

Tube Investments

AN industrial organization the size of Tube Investments Ltd poses in itself acute problems of company reporting. It takes two pages in the latest report from the company to detail those subsidiaries and associates 'which principally affect the results'. Some 70 subsidiaries are organized into steel tube, cycle, radiation, engineering and general, machine tool, electrical, aluminium and overseas divisions.

Note 13 to the balance sheet shows that there have been many and substantial additions (and also subtractions) from the group, with some of the additions stemming from the re-employment of funds released by steel nationalization. Although steel had been taken out of the 1966–67 accounts, there was – in providing adequate information in the 1967–68 accounts – a need to differentiate between new earnings and earnings common to both years.

This has been achieved, not in the body of the accounts or in the notes but in the directors' report. There, as Mr I. G. P. Hogg, M.A., C.A., the group chief accountant, says, the company has 'made a special effort to clarify the effect of new acquisitions, and disposals, on the results of the group for the year; and to illustrate the disposition of capital employed between the various divisions within the group and its profitability'.

'Common' and 'new'

The first main section in the directors' report concerns the year's results and reconciles sales of £250·1 million against £201·7 million with trading profits of £14·25 million against £11·73 million in the following table:

	Sales		Trading profit
	1967–68	1966–67	1967–68	1966–67
	£m	£m	£m	£m
Comparable companies	195·3	192·5	10·74	12·42
Acquisitions 1966–67	10·8	4 6	·60	·30
Acquisitions 1967–68	44·0	—	2·91	—
Disposal 1967–68	—	4·6	—	(·99)
	£250·1	£201·7	£14·25	£11·73

In making the position entirely clear in this manner, Tube Investments have done what this column has persistently urged should be done in cases where acquisitions and sales have changed the composition of the group and have thereby made one year's figures not truly comparable with those of the previous year. Basically it is a matter of showing 'common' earnings and 'new' earnings separately.

Tube Investments' acquisitions in the past year resulted in significant additions to group balance sheet figures and to put the position into perspective the directors' report shows the net assets of each of the group's divisions over the past four years to give a longer term view of the changes leading to the position at July 31st, 1968:

	Net assets excluding goodwill at July 31st
	1968	1967	1966	1965
Division	£000	£000	£000	£000
Steel Tube	52,748	46,620	45,206	39,430
Iron and Steel	—	—	42,416	46,999
Cycle	21,651	20,678	19,392	20,840
Radiation	17,102	—	—	—
Engineering and General	11,024	11,342	14,126	13,370
Machine Tool	10,211	10,385	7,321	—
Electrical	4,427	4,313	3,989	5,067
Aluminium	55,767	55,978	57,404	57,278
Overseas	17,744	11,641	8,727	8,959
Parent company and other service companies	2,888	36,695	(9,145)	(555)
	£193,562	£197,652	£189,436	£191,388

Shareholders' attention is drawn to the list of divisions and subsidiaries, to Note 9 to the accounts and to Note 16. It is also pointed out that, whereas as at July 1967 the group held £25·1 million in the form of short-term loans and net bank balances, those assets had been, by last July, replaced by net bank overdrafts of £9·7 million. The main reason for the turn round of £34·8 million was the £31 million cost of the new acquisitions.

Sales and profits

In addition to the changing pattern of the group in terms of net assets of the divisions, the directors' report provides a corresponding analysis in terms of external sales and profits before loan interest in the following table:

	External sales		Profit before loan interest payable
Division	1967–68	1966–67	1967–68	1966–67
	£000	£000	£000	£000
Steel Tube	63,586	65,121	4,286	6,949
Cycle	25,309	21,408	1,808	923
Radiation (10 months)	29,321	—	2,452	—

With all this detail and information provided in the directors' report, Lord Plowden, the chairman, is left, in his statement, to deal with broader aspects of group operation and prospects.

The boardroom view is that the work of the past few years is now taking effect 'and can be expected to be increasingly reflected in profits in the future'. Meanwhile the group's accounts not only fully discharge the company's public duties of accountability towards shareholders and other interested parties but also improve understanding within the divisions of their real contribution to the progress of the group.

CITY NOTES

THAT investors may 'feel some uneasiness about the degree to which ordinary shares are being regarded as a refuge rather than desirable investments in their own individual right' is suggested as a cause for concern by one stockbroking firm in its New Year investment survey. One would have thought that the cult of the equity was, by now, so deeply ingrained in investment lore that differentiation between refuge and desirability had become superfluous.

Where the one ends and the other begins – or vice versa – is exceedingly difficult to judge. Equities must continue to be both refuge and investment under conditions of distrust of money.

If, however, the brokers were merely pointing out to their clients that equity growth is not an even and automatic process, the words may prove a timely investment reminder.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – When the Scottish Institutes of Aberdeen, Edinburgh and Glasgow were integrated many years ago and became The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, that was a true 'merger' of three units which in every respect were 'like with like'. Every member involved in the consortium was already a chartered accountant, qualified by examination under the rules of the General Examining Board which were common to all three. So naturally, as a matter of truth and of right, the status quo of designation was preserved and the founder members of the new formation were still chartered accountants

2. Elements of comparable justification are not present in the proposals now before us, which are not a true 'merger' at all but are a 'take-over bid' by the three Institutes of Chartered Accountants involving the 'liquidation' of three bodies of non-chartered accountants. This is certainly not 'like with like'.

3. When (a), units to be amalgamated into a national consortium are not 'like with like' and they decide to name the new formation by the name of one of the constituent units, and (b), the unit whose name is to be so adopted gives prior consent to the others to do so, then such action is misleading to the public. Is not the deception of (a) known as 'passing off' on the part of the units declaring themselves to be what they are not? And is not the deception of (b) known as 'accessory before, during and after the fact'?

4. This incipient impropriety becomes dissembled under the proposals and is to be 'regularized' by the simple, arbitrary, administrative artifice of amending the terms of the constitution of the Royal Charters of the three existing Institutes of Chartered Accountants.

5. All the world knows that prior to ten years ago, every chartered accountant then living had been 'qualified by examination' to a standard which provided only the highest quality services on the basis of the greatest professional integrity. The public esteem in which the chartered accountants were held was something quite unique for a non-graduate profession – acquired slowly, steadily and consistently over a period of nearly a century and a quarter; and which, therefore, ought to have been maintained inviolate. It is untenable that it should be even temporarily adulterated, as has been admitted will be the case and as has been so euphemistically described as 'short-term dilution'. How long is 'short-term'? It will be the next half century and more.

6. It is now envisaged that with the consent of 60,000 chartered accountants, 30,000 non-chartered accountants will perpetrate what I consider to be, basically, an act of 'passing off' themselves as chartered accountants for the rest of their natural lives.

7. Maybe the proposals are deemed to be empirical and based upon the events of ten years ago when the chartered accountants permitted, and the incorporated accountants accepted, the latter's change of name to chartered accountant. The world at large, at the time, raised a few eyebrows in surprise that the profession could even think of such a thing as being morally possible – but they maintained a discerning silence. Nevertheless, the precedent so established caused them quietly to wonder who would be next on the list; and how far the chartered accountants were really prepared to go in 'adopting' and in giving their name to other accountancy organizations already alive or yet to be born. Now we all know. The flood gates are open wide.

8. Whatever this may do internally to the profession in the context of tolerance and sufferance, it can hardly do other, externally, than perturb the more discriminating of the British public who, in their hearts deep down, will react with silent incredulity at this self-inflicted damage to our professional probity. There are obvious grounds for their almost inevitable conclusion that such action is unworthy of a profession which has built up its whole high reputation for integrity by certifying 'true and fair views' in respect of others and yet proposes to present 'untrue and unfair views' in respect of itself.

9.1 It has taken well over 100 years for the profession to develop into its present state of 'fragmentation' and it is unrealistic to imagine that with equity and good faith it could become integrated overnight with one stroke of the legislative pen.

9.2 Nevertheless, we are a long way towards a solution. The Councils of the six bodies appear to have achieved substantial unanimity, in principle, on two initial essentials which are not likely to be disputed by anyone:

(a) The need for 'collective representation' of the 'fragments' on all matters of national and professional interest.

(Note. – This need not necessarily take the form recommended in the proposals and must be subject to the right of any organization to make 'minority' representations if it so wishes.)

(b) The need for the 'unification' of standards for all future students – on education, training and examination.

9.3 The gravamen of doubt and dissension amongst the members of the six is the name and the constitution by which the profession is to continue on to posterity – and the consequences this might have in public reactions of acceptance, or otherwise, of our accountancy and allied skills in their proposed new form of availability; and especially so in relation to the competitive services of management consultants in their various fields of activity and of the products of the university, the business schools and the polytechnics – bearing in mind, too, that although chartered and certified accountants are 'legislatively protected' in certain limited and defined areas of professional work, accountancy is likely ever to remain an open profession and never to become a closed-shop trade union.

10. It is sad and tragic that the administrative and organizational reconstruction envisaged under the proposals should contain such unhappy and undesirable features, because there are alternative methods available which could achieve the main objectives of consolidation in another manner devoid of these objections; and I have in mind no less than three choices.

11. Probably the limitation of your space would preclude your printing all my three choices of other methods and I therefore confine myself to my own preference which is substantially justified by the statement written by the President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland in his covering letter of July 25th, 1968, where he said:

> 'Recent experiences of inter-Institute collaboration on matters of professional and national interest has shown that the proposed joint committee structure can work well and effectively and, with goodwill on all sides, can secure the main benefits that could be claimed for a single institution.'

12. My preference accepts, as mandatory terms of reference, the two needs set out in paragraph 9.2 (above) – so I do not repeat them here; but in addition I recommend:

(i) That there be no change at all in any of the six; or in the use by members of existing titles and designatory letters until they each die their natural deaths.

(ii) That all future students, though operating under complete unification of standards are, nevertheless, to be entirely free each to choose his own alma mater out of the six.

(Note. – Predictably, most students would be likely to choose 'chartered'; and, if so, by the profession patiently 'waiting for it', in 30/40 years' time, the members of the profession would be predominantly chartered accountants so, in the end, the name 'chartered accountant' would become almost exclusively preserved for the whole profession in an acceptable manner – so enabling the present 30,000 non-chartered accountants to avoid the odium likely to be attached to their artificial acquisition of that title now.)

(iii) That the form and powers of the existing joint committees for the six be strengthened by converting them into a small, effective and powerful national consortium (for all five countries within Great Britain and Ireland), with its members nominated by the six (probably not much more than 100 all told) with a new national title of its own, say, for example 'The Federation of British Accountants'.

Note (a). – If 12 (ii) above materializes and serves its purpose, then, in 30 to 40 years' time, the name now proposed of 'The Federation of British Accountants' could itself then be changed (if this became the wish of the profession), to 'The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Great Britain and Ireland'.

Note (b). – The reasons given for preserving the three sub-national Institutes of Scotland, England and Wales, and Ireland are 'differences' of education, history and environment. These reasons are disproven and, I submit, are rendered invalid by the fact that Ireland has only one Institute and yet it quite successfully covers and controls two of the most diverse and controversial countries in the world – Northern Ireland and the Republic. Furthermore, there is a plethora of examples of one national institute for the five countries within Great Britain and Ireland, e.g. secretaries, actuaries, architects, insurance, etc. Why not also for accountants? However, it will be seen that under my recommendation this seemingly controversial issue does not arise – because all six are proposed to be left as they now are.

13. However, the Councils of the six (with the exception of the ICWA who have made no firm recommendation to their members) appear to have agreed 'terms' between the chartered Institutes and the other bodies as willing buyers and willing sellers. But will 'the contract' stand up to scrutiny? The rank and file of all six have the onus of ultimate decision through the power of the ballot box. I earnestly hope that the majority will vote against the proposals.

14. May I conclude by saying that I am simply appalled with the suggested 'second-class accountant' under the horrible name of 'Licentiate Accountant'. The whole idea is anathema to me. The profession has more than enough to do in ensuring the availability of only one category, the 'first-class accountant' – the chartered accountant, or any one of the other three organizations under the new unified standards. For these lesser levels there is nothing wrong with the term 'clerks'. We already have highly respected and efficient bank clerks, insurance clerks, shipping clerks, railway clerks and a host of others. So why not accounts clerks – and leave it at that? All clerks will continue to acquire their knowledge and skills in the traditional manner. I am glad to see that the Scottish Institute have 'contracted out' of this one – at least so far as 'practising certificates' are concerned. If a licentiate accountant of the future were to be asked: 'What is your profession?': he would be entitled to reply 'I am a member of The Institute of Chartered Accountants' – and there we go again – more dilution.

Yours faithfully,

Radyr, Cardiff. ALEXANDER LINDSAY, C.A.

SIR, – I congratulate 'R. K.' (December 14th issue) upon the idea of the formation of an Association of Management Accountants by the integration of all the small accountancy bodies. By this, the number of accountancy bodies in Britain would be reduced to two or three, i.e., The Institute of Chartered Accountants, The Association of Management Accountants and The Institute of Company Accountants (who provide specialized training programmes for accountants not in public practice).

After all, the aim of the present proposals of the integration is to reduce the number of bodies and the confusion which is caused in the public mind as to the service provided. This would aim at that and also make sure that healthy competition exists in the field of accountancy and auditing without being monopolized by any one body.

Finally, I would like to say that the overseas members are an advantage to Britain, not only in the provision of competent service by members of British bodies but also as a source of regular invisible income in the form of subscriptions etc. As our Prime Minister recently said: 'every penny counts!'

Yours faithfully,

Coventry. K. N. K. MENON.

SIR, – I wish to endorse the views and suggestions of 'R. K.' published in The Accountant of December 14th. He has brought a new view forward regarding overseas students. If the present proposals of restrictions over the membership of overseas students is implemented, it could result in the ruin of the image of the British accountancy associations throughout the world.

The large bodies plan to integrate the profession of accountancy as if it was a major take-over bid of other bodies of equal status so that they would be a 'holding company' and the others their 'subsidiaries'.

Further, I fully agree with 'R. K.' who has indirectly suggested the integration of the small bodies not in the scheme into forming an association of management accountants who would cater for and supply the needs of industry and commerce leaving the enlarged bodies to deal mostly with public practice.

A word for the small bodies who are being looked upon as second-class, either because they are not in the scheme or because they have been offered Lic. A for their members: 'United we stand and divided we fall'.

Yours faithfully,

Birmingham. V. BAHL.

SIR, – I find Mr Wright's letter (December 7th issue) an unfortunate contribution to the debate on integration, since he is seeking to perpetuate a class of second-rate citizens even more marked than the distinction made when the Institute merged with the Society.

There is a great deal of misunderstanding and prejudice regarding the other bodies among a large number of chartered accountants: misunderstanding based largely on ignorance and prejudice arising from a feeling of superiority. There is no doubt that the title 'chartered accountant' carries prestige value, but that in itself is not sufficient to justify demoting associates of the other bodies to the rank of licentiate.

If Mr Wright based his suggestions on the examination and training standards of The Association of Corporate and Certified Accountants and The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, I suggest that he makes a closer study of recent examination papers and pass rates. The depth and scope of the examinations of these two bodies should, in most instances, cause the Institute to look to its laurels. The very much lower pass rates may well be a reflection on the pass mark rather than the standard of the students.

Yours faithfully,

Sittingbourne, Kent. I. P. A. STITT.

Reviews

Williams' Law and Practice in Bankruptcy

Eighteenth edition by MUIR HUNTER, Q.C., M.A., and DAVID GRAHAM, M.A., B.C.L., Barrister-at-law.

Stevens & Sons Ltd, London. 10 gns.

It is ten years since the appearance of the last edition of this standard work on bankruptcy and Mr Muir Hunter, assisted this time by a colleague, has contrived to deal with the changes in that ten years without adding more than 40 pages to the length of the book. In that time, both long-term capital gains tax and betterment levy have reared their ugly heads and there are specific provisions in the relevant legislation which concern trustees in bankruptcy.

Needless to say, the provisions in the Finance Acts concerning capital gains tax are not so specific, nor so easy to follow, as those in the Land Commission Act 1967. Paragraphs 10 and 14 of Schedule 10 to the Finance Act 1966 dealing with a trustee in bankruptcy's liability for capital gains tax, present some nice problems of construction. The learned editors of Williams disagree with the construction of paragraph 10 (1) which appears in the 1967 edition of Wheatcroft on Capital Gains Taxes. Indeed, they say that they do not think it likely that the Wheatcroft construction would be adopted.

An indication of the meticulous care that has gone into this edition is the fact that a long-standing error in earlier editions has been corrected. It was established in In re Lang Propellor Co ([1926] Ch. 585) that tax deducted from mortgage interest was not a preferential debt. This decision was nullified in the Finance Act 1927 but this fact was not revealed in the seventeenth edition. The eighteenth edition puts the matter right.

Although there has been no legislative change since the last edition in the Bankruptcy Acts themselves, other changes are so considerable that it was essential to have the new edition.

Rate Equalization in London

by A. R. Ilersic.

The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, London. 20*s*.

The central – predominantly commercial and administrative – area of London possesses a concentration of high rateable values; the citizens who help to create the wealth of the area mainly reside outside it; the peripheral local authorities which provide for the social needs of those citizens would, but for rate equalization, have no means of tapping its rateable resources.

These three factors have created a situation which has produced Professor A. R. Ilersic's study Rate Equalization in London, published by the IMTA. Professor Ilersic describes how the unique extremity of these factors has added to the unequal distribution of the local taxation burden despite attempts by the Government in 1948, 1958 and 1966 to equalize local authority resources on a national scale through the Exchequer Grant system. He goes on to trace the history of rate equalization in Inner London throughout this period and to identify its shortcomings.

In new proposals for equalization, Professor Ilersic suggests a wider scheme which takes account of local rateable resources and social needs and measures these needs not solely by expenditure of individual authorities but by objective criteria such as population and its age distribution in each area – an approach which has not been consistently featured in previous schemes.

Although the study will be of particular interest to Londoners, Professor Ilersic has recognized in a postscript that impending local government reform could call for a much wider application. His views are logical, lucid and persuasive; everyone who is interested in local taxation and its relationship to total national taxation should find in the study much food for thought.

The Investor in a Changing Economy

by DAVID A. WEST.

Prentice-Hall International, London. 23*s* 6*d*.

There are too many investors who base their investment policies purely on the past profits record of a company, its management or its product. These are important considerations, of course, but in the longer if not the shorter run, the key determinant of profitability must be the state of the economy in which the company functions. Not only the economic influences but also Government policy in respect of particular industries or products can be crucial for profitability. This American paperback looks at the economic, social and legislative background of the United States investment scene and provides a number of sensible propositions which are equally relevant to the UK economy.

Butterworths Tax Handbook 1968–69

Edited by DAVID ROBERTS.

Butterworths, London. 54*s*.

This years' familiar yellow book covering all the income tax, corporation tax and capital gains tax legislation made its welcome appearance less than three months after the Finance Act 1968 reached the Statute Book. Despite miracles of compression, the book now runs to more than 1,000 pages, which gives an apt comment on the industry of the Government in producing ever longer and more verbose Finance Acts, in contrast with their promise of simplified taxation. The 1963–64 yellow book had only slightly more than 600 pages.

Nevertheless, the current edition is still reasonably easy to handle and to carry about. It compares very favourably with the two ponderous tomes published by the Stationary Office, though of course the latter do contain some statutory instruments as well. The publishers this year have had to cope not only with the Finance Act but also with the Capital Allowances Act 1968 which, as it appears on the Statute Book, covers 126 pages. This new Act has reduced Part X of the Income Tax Act 1952 to but a shadow of its former self.

Decimal Planning for PAYE and National Insurance

GUIDANCE on how Britain's change to decimal currency will affect PAYE and both graduated and flat-rate national insurance contributions, was given on Monday in a joint statement by Inland Revenue and the Department of Health and Social Security issued by the Decimal Currency Board. It was stated that the information was being made known as far ahead as possible to allow for forward planning of decimal working.

The date fixed for the introduction of decimal currency is D-Day, February 15th, 1971. It will be followed by a changeover period of not more than 18 months during which the old £ s d currency and the new £ p currency will both be legal tender.

PAYE

Employers will be able to convert their PAYE records to decimal working at any suitable time from April 6th, 1970.

For the tax year 1970–71, PAYE deduction cards will be designed to enable employers to convert entries to decimal at any time during that year. Employers who make the change to decimal before D-Day will be able to use the £ s d tax tables in conjunction with a conversion table. From D-Day, PAYE tax tables in both £ s d and £ p will be available for the changeover period which follows D-Day. The conversion table and the decimal tax tables will show two decimal places of a £.

A dual currency form P.45 (particulars of employee leaving) will be brought into use on April 6th, 1970; but where this form is used before D-Day, employers will have to enter details in £ s d in case the new employer has not converted to decimal working. During the changeover period after D-Day, these entries may be made in either currency.

Employers who do not use official PAYE deduction cards but supply their own cards or forms, should consult their local Inspectors of Taxes before ordering stationery for 1970–71.

Graduated National Insurance Contributions

It is intended to make the following arrangements for graduated national insurance contributions. New banded tables, expressed to two decimal places of a £, will be provided and will be available for use when required from April 6th, 1970, onwards. From the same date, employers who prefer to calculate their graduated contributions direct from the appropriate percentages will be able to calculate the decimal rates by using the same percentages but rounding to the nearest second decimal place of a £.

Employers still making up their payrolls in £ s d after D-Day will be able to continue using the £ s d graduated contribution rates during the changeover period. Employers should, however, make the change to decimal rates of graduated contributions at the same time as they make the change to decimal expression of PAYE tax deductions.

Flat-rate National Insurance Contributions

Planning is on the basis that from D-Day there will be a fresh range of flat-rate national insurance contributions, expressed in £ p. These will be exact or near equivalents of the pre-D-Day £ s d rates and, to facilitate payrolling, the employer's and employee's shares of the insurance stamp values will not contain any new halfpennies. (It follows that the stamp values themselves will not contain new halfpennies.)

The new decimal insurance stamps will not be on sale at post offices before D-Day; nor will the £ s d stamps be on sale from D-Day onwards. Employers still payrolling in £ s d after D-Day will have to buy decimal stamps – the only stamps available. Some latitude will, however, be allowed transitionally as regards acceptance of stamps in either currency.

Where flat-rate contributions are paid direct to the Department of Health and Social Security by the schedule or invoice method, or are paid by impressed stamping, it is intended that, broadly, the contribution rates applicable for the period up to D-Day will, as in the case of adhesive stamping, be the £ s d ones and from D-Day onwards will be the new decimal ones.

Mariners

Special arrangements for mariners on foreign going ships are to be discussed with the shipping industry.

According to the National Economic Development Council Report on Management Recruiting and Development some 350,000 managers are engaged in the manufacturing industry alone. Their jobs and those of their colleagues elsewhere are changing. The new breed of managers are technologically-minded men eager for the right information on which to base their decisions.

Behind the change lies the evolution of management sciences and services – among them operational research, linear programming, network analysis, systems analysis, applications of the computer, consultancy, and marketing research.

The earlier chapters of this book are devoted to planning, organization, direction and policy-making and the process of decision.

Further the author tries to show where operational research, network analysis, computer installations, and consultancy come into activities. Finally he has examined the divisions of marketing and purchasing from the standpoint of a board of directors which is responsible for discharging planning and control functions rather than with the eyes of a sales or purchasing specialist.

For the director or chief executive, his review of basic management activities should strike answering chords. For middle management it should provide a stimulus to progress towards even higher responsibilities.

For the student of management whose immediate objective is the successful completion of a degree or diploma course, or who is on the way to achieving the status of a qualified accountant, cost accountant, company secretary, work study practitioner, purchasing officer, O. & M. manager, marketing manager, or training officer there should be a special benefit to be drawn from the author's integrated approach to his subject.

Capital Finance and Inflation

INFLATION has become a fact of life. The British public seems prepared to live with it as long as money earnings rise, though some seek inflation hedges ranging from equities to mortgaged property. Due to inflation and, more especially, to the progressive rates of income tax and surtaxes, it is not so easy to increase real earnings and despite the fact that a generation has lived its adult life throughout inflation, there are still many who fail to appreciate the erosion of wealth and income which inflation, coupled with progressive taxation, can bring about.

It is not only in the field of estate duty provision that this problem exists; as the article 'Capital Requirements of Practitioners' on other pages in this issue demonstrates, it is a problem for the active as well. The thesis developed by our contributor is simple: rising costs in a professional practice, which are the inevitable accompaniment of inflation, necessitate additional working capital which because of steeply progressive taxation of earnings, becomes increasingly difficult to accumulate.

In the vast majority of practices, working capital must come from the savings of partners which in their turn are derived from the net earnings after tax which the practice provides. Unfortunately, while money incomes rise, net incomes in real terms after tax tend all too often to diminish. In the article the author concludes, on the basis of nominal rates of inflation and growth of the practice, that at varying stages of their professional lives partners may have to plough back almost half of their net earnings to meet their capital requirements in the practice. If rather more unfavourable assumptions are made concerning the rate of inflation, then the proportion needed from the partners' earnings after tax could rise to as much as 61 per cent.

Readers who followed the proceedings of the Royal Commission on Taxation of Profits and Income will recall that industrial witnesses put forward a similar thesis – that ruling rates of tax, plus capital allowances based upon historical costs of plant, would mean that many firms would run down their capital equipment. The case was not proven; indeed, the handsome profits earned have ensured that this danger did not, generally speaking, eventuate. In the case of public companies, of course, the profits were taxed, not at progressive rates but at flat rates; however, it could yet be with the effects of the 1965 Finance Act on private companies, that such dire results could become a reality.

There is already some discussion that professional firms should incorporate, especially those in the stock-market where inflation and tax rates have decimated the finances of the smaller firms. The contributor of our article suggests that as a first step accounting practices might consider taking in a sleeping partner to provide finance since it is becoming increasingly difficult to raise loan finance. Is there not here a case for taking advantage of the benefits of incorporation, with outsiders providing some equity finance and the board being made up of the present partners?

To many successful practitioners such thoughts will be a far cry from reality, while to some the idea may well seem to be bordering upon heresy. But economic events and pressures, like the tides, wait upon no man. With such evidence as that adduced by our contributor should not the profession be thinking beyond the mere stage of integration, to the very structure of the professional practice?

Estate Duty Aggregation – II

LAST week we reviewed the historical background to section 38 of the Finance Act 1968. We should add that it was most probably the blatant and widespread advertising of this method of tax avoidance which finally induced the Government to stop it. Section 38 (1) reads:

> 'For the purposes of aggregation, any property which under section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894 (gifts inter vivos and other disposition in lifetime of deceased) passes on the death shall be property in which the deceased had an interest.'

Section 38 (2) reads:

> 'Subsection (1) above applies in particular in relation to:
> (a) section 4 of the Finance Act 1894 (non-aggregation of property in which the deceased never had an interest), and
> (b) section 33 (2) of the Finance Act 1954 (policies of assurance etc. in which the deceased never had an interest).'

It must be borne in mind that section 38 (1), (2) apply to all kinds of property passing, or deemed to pass, on the death; in other words it is by no means confined to assets which are insurance policies or rights therein. However, the subsections concerned do not apply to all passing or deemed passing on a death. The Inland Revenue will have to show that there is a deemed passing 'under section 2 (1) (c)'. Presumably this extends not only to cases within section 38 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1881, as extended by section 11 of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1888, but also to cases where the deceased discharged non-deductible debts (Finance Act 1939, section 31 (2)) and to liability under section 34 (2) of the Finance Act 1959 (payment of insurance premiums). The deceased must have made some kind of gift or quasi gift. It follows that where owing to the adoption of a perpetuity period by reference to some individual unconnected with the settlement, the death of that individual, although causing a passing under some other charging section, will not cause his estate to be aggregated with the settled property.

It is a commonplace of estate duty and, indeed, of other taxes, that the Inland Revenue often have two or more alternative claims arising from the same sequence of events. Where that is so, it seems to be well established that the Revenue can choose the charging provision which exacts the maximum duty. There is authority for this in Speyer v. CIR ([1908] AC 92), and in Anderson v. CIR (17 ATC 611).

It is interesting to observe that in a case to which the Inland Revenue were not even parties, the Court held that the higher of two alternative duties was chargeable (Oettinger v. Cohn ((1908) 1 KB 582). What, then, is to happen about aggregation where there is a claim both under section 2 (1) (c) of the Finance Act 1894 (where aggregation is compulsory) and also under some other estate duty provision where non-aggregation would apply? This question is answered by subsections (3) and (4) of section 38.

Subsection (3) deals with the simple case where all the property in question passes under section 2 (1) (c) and all or part of it also passes, as non-aggregable property, on the death otherwise than under section 2 (1) (c). In that situation the Inland Revenue are given no choice; the duty must be charged and levied on the property as if it passed solely under section 2 (1) (c). It follows that subject to any relief given by section 38, that property would be aggregated.

Subsection (4) deals with the more complicated situation where only part of the property passing on the death is hit by section 2 (1) (c) and is comprised in property which (or a part of which) also passes as non-aggregable property on the death otherwise than under section 2 (1) (c). In such a case, one must isolate the part which passes under section 2 (1) (c) and actually charge it under section 2 (1) (c), so that it is aggregable.

Only the remainder is to be charged, on a non-aggregable basis, under an estate duty provision which is not within section 2 (1) (c).

These rules under subsections (3) and (4) are elaborated by subsection (5). The valuation of property for the purposes of those subsections is to be made before any reduction under section 64 of the Finance Act 1960 (graduation of charge where the gift was made two years or more before the death). References to property or part of property include references to rights or interests in the property.

As is almost invariable with estate duty legislation, section 38 is confined to deaths occurring after the date on which the new legislation was announced, i.e., in the present case, after March 19th, 1968 (subsection (6)). The Government deny that this is retrospective legislation although, of course, it is bound to hit transactions which were finalized before March 20th, 1968, and which cannot now be undone. There is some very limited relief for pre-Budget transactions but only in the case of a very limited type of property, namely, insurances on the life of the deceased and contracts for deferred annuities where the annuity becomes payable on the death of the deceased. The relieving provisions are introduced, in somewhat optimistic vein, by subsection (7), which reads (our italics):

> 'Subject to the following subsections, this section[1] shall not apply to property passing on the death as comprised in a gift of, or of rights under, a policy of assurance on the life of the deceased issued in respect of an insurance made before March 20th, 1968'.

A policy of insurance is made normally when the insurance company accepts the proposal form. The policy itself is usually issued somewhat later. This kind of time-lag is exemplified in Ralli Bros Trustee Co Ltd v. CIR (46 ATC 300). Subsection (7) makes it clear that it is only necessary for the insurance to be 'made' before March 20th, 1968. With subsection (7) must be read subsection (12) which provides that section 38 shall apply to a contract for a deferred annuity becoming payable on the death of the deceased as if it were a policy of assurance on his life. (The draftsman's inability to make up his mind as to whether to say 'assurance' or 'insurance' will be noted.)

Subsection (7) having apparently given relief so lavishly for pre-Budget policies, subsection (8) takes most of it back by restricting the relief to an arbitrary maximum of £25,000 worth of total insurance. Since not all of the moneys secured by a policy will necessarily be caught for estate duty purposes (e.g., where deceased has paid only some of the premiums), the maximum effective relief may be on a sum much smaller than £25,000.

Subsection (8) – without the proviso – reads:

> 'If the aggregate value of all policies related to the death which were issued in respect of an insurance made before March 20th, 1968, exceed £25,000 the relief given by subsection (7) above shall apply only to a fraction of the said property, and that fraction shall be £25,000 divided by the said aggregate value'.

A policy is 'related to the death' if:

(i) it is on the life of the deceased; and

(ii) property comprised in a gift of (or of rights under) the policy passes on the death; and

(iii) the property in (ii) would (but for section 38) have been property in which the deceased never had an interest (subsection (13) (b)).

A great many policies not on the life of the deceased were taken out before March 20th, 1968, and will be hit by section 38 (1). It is not clear why the Government has confined relief to policies on the life of the deceased.

It must be emphasized again that in arriving at the 'total value' for the purposes of the £25,000 limit, the Revenue are not confined to the value of the 'property' at (ii) above. One must take the full value, as at the date of death, of the sums payable (or other benefits arising) under the policy (subsection (13) (a)). In the ordinary way this is so, even if the policy has not been maintained up to the date of death. A policy could well have provided for payments to be made on it by the insurance company before the death of the life assured. There could be no difficulty about valuing payments.

However, an unusual type of policy might have provided for some insurance company handing over to the assured, before the death of the life assured, a piece of property such as units of a unit trust. These apparently have to be valued as at the date of the death of the life assured. But where the policy has been surrendered before the death, then the consideration given by the insurance company for such surrender is to be valued as at the date of surrender, not as at the date of death.

Suppose that money has been borrowed from the insurance company on the security of the policy itself. Obviously the insurance company will deduct the debt when paying out the policy, so that in one sense this is a reduction of 'The sums payable or other benefits arising under the policy' (subsection 13 (a)).

In Re Hodges Policy (36 ATC 51, 270) duty was payable under the fourth paragraph of section 11 (1) of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act 1889, which formerly imposed duty on policy moneys but was repealed in 1959. The relevant words in that fourth paragraph were: 'Money received under a policy of insurance'. The total money payable under the terms of the policy itself in Hodges was £16,675 but this was subject to a charge in favour of the insurance company to secure the repayment to that company of £5,431.

[1] More correctly 'subsections (1) to (5) of this section' – Ed.

Accordingly, what the policy-holder actually received net was only £11,244.

Nevertheless, it was held that the 'money received under the policy' was the full £16,675. Lord Evershed said (36 ATC, at page 275):

> 'That sum cannot be reduced by setting off what in fact upon another account and by way of mortgage, the plaintiff owed to the insurers. As the judge pointed out. if the transaction had been in the form of a mortgage to a third party it would have been impossible for the plaintiff to have said otherwise than that the money received under the policy, for all of which he had to give a receipt, was the £16,675'.

In the light of that dictum it seems plain that there can be no deduction for a charged policy when arriving at the 'value' for the purposes of subsection (13) (a).

It is to be implied from subsection (8) that if the aggregate value of all policies related to the death in respect of insurance made before March 20th, 1968, does not exceed £25,000, then the subsection (7) relief applies in full. In other words, non-aggregation (subject to section 33 of the Finance Act 1954) is to be applied. The effect of subsection (8) where the aggregate value exceeds £25,000 can be illustrated by the following example.

'X, before March 20th, 1968, procured the issue of two policies on his own life – one for donee A absolutely for £30,000; the other for donee B absolutely for £45,000. X dies after March 19th, 1968, in such circumstances that both policies pass in full under section 2 (1) (c). The total value of the policies under subsection (13) (a) is thus £75,000. The fraction enjoined by subsection (8) is $\frac{£25,000}{£75,000}$ or one-third. It follows that one-third of each of the two policies escapes aggregation under section 38.

'We come now to the proviso to subsection (8) which reads:

> "Provided that the rate at which estate duty is to be charged in respect of that fraction of any property shall not be less than the rate at which it would have been charged if the relief given by subsection (7) was not restricted by this subsection."

It follows that in the case of A's £30,000 (and assuming that there are no other policies to be taken into account) he pays on £20,000 at the full aggregated rate. On the remaining one-third – i.e., £10,000 – he pays at a rate applicable to an estate worth £30,000. Thus although the £10,000 is preserved from aggregation, it attracts duty not at 6 per cent but at 21 per cent. The fact that the unrelieved £20,000 is fully aggregated is spelled out by subsection (11) of section 38.'

(To be concluded.)

The Joint Diploma Scheme

POST-QUALIFYING education was not considered during the discussions which led to the publication of the scheme for the development of the accountancy profession but it is understood that this topic will be examined in detail if the scheme is approved by members.

There can, of course, be little doubt that there is a very real need for educational programmes at a post-qualifying level to help members to specialize in certain fields and to keep abreast of increasingly complex legislation and the rapid introduction of new business techniques. In fact, the first joint venture by the professional bodies at this level was launched in 1966 in the form of the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services which has the aims of encouraging the study of management accounting and of improving the standard of service which the profession can give to industry, commerce and the public service in this field of work.

Whether or not this management accounting diploma is to be followed by others remains to be seen but in the absence of any reference to the diploma in the development scheme, it is encouraging to find that the following statement has been issued under the signature of the Presidents of the three Chartered Institutes, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants and The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants:

> Whether or not the present scheme for the development of the accountancy profession is implemented, we reiterate that the Joint Diploma in Management Accounting Services has the full support of the respective Councils of the participating bodies.

We urge members, whether engaged in public practice, consultancy, industry, commerce or the public service, to give the Joint Diploma their full support in every way.

It is understood that there are now over 300 holders of the Joint Diploma and that a further 300 members are at various stages in 'the pipeline'. Younger members will certainly find the syllabus for the Part I examination helpful and stimulating (all relevant modern techniques are included) and employers would be well advised to consider the adoption of the syllabus for both parts of the examination as a training guide or as the basis of their management development programmes for newly qualified men. The Joint Diploma syllabus can also be a most useful aid to employers and personnel consultants as a yardstick against which they can measure the knowledge and practical experience of applicants for appointments in the fields of financial management and consultancy.

The Joint Diploma Scheme is a significant and welcome development in professional education, full details of which are given in the very readable booklet issued by The Joint Diploma Board, 73 Cheapside, London EC2. (01–236 6684/6654.)

News of the World Wins the Day

MR ROBERT MAXWELL finally conceded victory to the News of the World camp last week, though this was not without a flurry of excitement just before the end, when three members of the N.o.W. Pension Fund sought a High Court ruling to prevent their trustees (all of whom were directors of the N.o.W.) from voting the fund's 6 per cent shareholding in favour of the N.o.W. board's proposals to link up with Mr Rupert Murdoch's Australian concern, News Ltd.

Giving judgment, Mr Justice Megarry said the three members of the N.o.W. Pension Fund, who were backed by the Pergamon Press Ltd, had been used as pawns in the fight for control of the company by Mr Maxwell and his allies on one hand and Sir William Carr (Chairman of N.o.W. and one of the defendants) and Mr Murdoch on the other.

Concerning the defendants' dual position as directors and trustees, the judge said there was nothing wrong with a director of a company seeking to retain office. But he must put the interest of the beneficiaries first, even if that resulted in him not retaining office.

However, his lordship went on to say that under the law it would not be possible for the Court to intervene either to enjoin the trustees from voting at all or requiring them to vote in any particular way. Consequently the application failed. As a result, the ensuing poll showed that 46·9 per cent of the votes were cast in favour of the resolution to allot a 35 per cent interest to News Ltd in exchange for certain of its Australian assets, and 33·3 per cent were cast against (including the 25 per cent holding of Professor Derek Jackson which had been pledged to Pergamon). Just over 15 per cent of the voting stock in the hands of Hambros and News Ltd was 'neutralized' at the request of the Take-over Panel, while the remaining 5 per cent of the votes available were not exercised at all.

The formal withdrawal of Pergamon's bid frees the trustees of the Jackson family from their obligation to Pergamon (presumably the writ taken out by them against the N.o.W. board, News Ltd and Hambros will now be allowed to lapse), but it still leaves the future of this block of shares and the Hambros holdings undecided for the moment.

New Year Honours

A NUMBER of members of the accountancy profession – at home and abroad – featured prominently in the New Year Honours List, published on Wednesday of last week. Among them are two Knights Bachelor: Mr J. F. Mallabar, F.C.A., chairman, Harland & Wolff Ltd, and senior partner in the firm of J. F. Friendly Societies Report

THE combined membership of friendly societies (other than collecting societies) at the end of 1967 was 5·5 million and their funds exceeded £300 million, according to Part I of the Report of the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies for 1967 recently published (HMSO, price 6s).

The total amount paid in benefits during the year under review by friendly societies without branches reached a record £22·6 million. Included in this figure was £4·2 million for sickness benefits; £4·6 million paid on maturity of endowments and £6·2 million withdrawn from members' deposit accounts. The corresponding figure for benefit paid out by 'Orders' and their branches in 1967 will be in the region of £3 million.

There was a net decrease of 34 (including one collecting society) in the number of friendly societies and a net decrease of 595 in the number of registered branches. The general summary at the end of the report shows that the total number of organizations submitting returns to the Chief Registrar at the end of 1967 was 21,245 compared with 21,420 at the end of the previous year.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Peaks and Troughs

by An Industrious Accountant

IT was a gloomy board meeting in more ways than one. The evening shadows seemed to lurk in the corners despite the lights; the directors scowled darkly across the table; the news was bleaker yet.

The cause was the collapse of our latest subcontractor. Our loan to him was irretrievable, our holding of his shares worthless, our advertising campaign a write-off. The loss was heavy. The problem was how far to show it in the year's accounts now almost completed.

We had no alternative but to charge it as a special provision for losses foreseen to be incurred, I ventured. The amounts were reasonably calculable, subject to minor salvage. True, discovery had taken place after the actual year-end but it was in plenty of time to include the figures in the draft accounts already in course of audit. The directors' report could amplify the information for the shareholders.

The suggestion seemed to fall into a deep pit of silence which by no means betokened assent. Then somebody wondered whether it was, in fact, really necessary to include such a provision. After all, the failure was this year's liability not last year's. Somebody else concurred, reminding us that the extent of the loss was still problematical, still possibly capable of being offset by an injection of outside capital.

The deputy-chairman said the disclosure would shatter shareholders' confidence, in fact it would do them more harm than good in the long run. The managing director thought a token reserve might be adequate inasmuch as the present year might well regain much of the ground lost. Our priority might well be to protect share equity values. Peaks and troughs should be ironed out in the best interests of our members, for whose solvency we were responsible. Sometimes the less shareholders knew the better.

An uncomfortable minority of one became apparent. As a last-ditch stand I indicated that the auditors might not like non-disclosure. Their financial grapevine was active and accurate; they were bound to hear the news.

Somebody retorted that if we presented the accounts in a form acceptable to the board then it was the auditors' duty to certify them. Nobody – least of all auditors – could estimate the salvage value of the wreckage. Another voice agreed, remarking that they could always insert some sort of warning qualification in their report or attend the annual general meeting or something.

The deputy-chairman growled that he didn't know what auditors were coming to these days. Anybody would think these pettifogging pen-pushers owned the joint. Our audit fee was worth a lot to them; they wouldn't be in a hurry to risk losing it.

My hint that replacement in such circumstances might prove delicate, if not . . . ahem . . . difficult, resulted in another pause. Then the managing director said deliberately that presumably it was up to the accountants, all speaking the same language and so forth, to talk things out and come up with the right answer, having regard to the special circumstances. It was up to me, he rasped irritably, to see these chaps right away; damn well straighten them out and stand no nonsense. It was not only my responsibility but also my duty to ensure that the company's good name, its employees' jobs, and everyone's future prosperity took precedence of any tupp'ny-ha'penny nonsensical high-falutin accountants' scruples!

So I told him bluntly just where he got off; it was about time he realized . . . .

Then I woke up, snug and warm in bed, but still seething with indignation. The trouble is I'm not sure I'd have told him off if I hadn't been asleep.

Capital Requirements of Practitioners

CONTRIBUTED

ALL practitioners are painfully aware that a sizeable amount of their earnings has to be ploughed back in to the practice. Many will have analysed this as arising under three heads – inflation (or falling money value), expansion and increasing seniority. It may, however, come as a shock to see just how much is likely to be required in the next few years, and the writer has made some computations to illustrate it.

A large-medium-sized firm is assumed, with working capital of £120,000, gross fees of £250,000 and a net profit before tax of £80,000. Whether or not this is regarded as a good return on capital depends on one's assumptions as to the 'salary' value of the partners' work. If one goes by the salaries commanded today by below-average newly qualified men, most of the profit should be regarded as salary. If one looks at the average profits disclosed in the English Institute's survey of a few years ago, the results are extremely good. Probably it is fair to say that while many firms do better – even a lot better – this would be regarded by most as satisfactory.

Annual increase in capital

Since changes from one year to the next can have very abrupt effects as between partners, the position today is compared in the Appendix with the likely position three years ahead to show the total change over three years, and thence the average change each year. It will be seen that the senior partner is expected to retire (and to have his capital repaid over two years); two new partners are expected to be taken in.

Until recently, inflation generally has been running at perhaps 4 per cent per annum, but accountants' work in progress and hence, one hopes, their debtors – which between them account for most of their working capital – have recently been increasing at more like three times that rate. In addition some allowance must be made for expansion of the practice, for with the recent increase in the amount of work for each client arising from such sources as capital gains tax, investment grants and the Companies Act 1967, a firm that does not expand is in reality falling back.

Two sets of figures are shown in the Appendix. One assumes (A) a total increase in capital over three years of £30,000 to a total of £150,000; this is equivalent to 4 per cent per annum for inflation and 3½ per cent for expansion. The other assumes (B) an increase of £45,000 to £165,000, equivalent to 3½ per cent per annum for expansion and just over 7 per cent for inflation. These are not alarmist figures – there is a very serious possibility that the reality will be far worse.

Goodwill is entirely ignored for financial purposes (a generous policy by the senior partners when it was introduced, which greatly reduces the financial burden on junior partners). It has, however, been the firm's practice to pay annuities to retired partners or their widows, and these took £5,000 out of the £80,000 mentioned above. When retirement annuity policies were introduced in 1956, it was decided to phase out the annuities. Partners then under 45 were required to make maximum contributions each year and would receive no annuities. Those from 45–60 would receive reduced annuities and were recommended to make contributions but not necessarily maximum ones. (Appropriate adjustments were made to shares of profit).

Illustration

Consideration is then given to three individual partners at widely differing points in the scale, the following assumptions being made about them:

Partner No.	2	6	10
Age	60	45	32
Married	Yes	Yes	Yes
Dependent children	(grown-up)	1 over 16	2 under 11
Taxed dividend income	£300	£100	Nil
Building society interest payable	—	£150	£300
Charitable covenants (gross)	£50	£20	£10

From the computations on the next page it may be seen that on the optimistic assumptions of (A) each of the three partners, at varying stages of their careers, has to plough back between 42 and 46 per cent of his net income from the firm. On the assumptions of (B) – which it is feared are more realistic – the amounts needed vary from just over 50 per cent for partner 10 to 61 per cent for partner 2. Spendable income as a proportion of gross earnings is derisory. Furthermore, the phrase 'Net spendable income from firm' is still rather optimistic for partners 6 and 10 since they have yet to charge their building society payments.

An important part of the trouble is that a substantial amount of the 'profit' of each year is not profit at all; it is the maintenance of working capital, which must now be expressed in the debased value of the currency compared with 12 months earlier. For a company this is a nuisance; for an individual taxed on this imaginary top slice of his income at 15*s* in the £ or more, it can be a disaster.

It should be noted that partner 2 has reached a point where additional earned income is taxed at at least 14*s* 9*d*. A few more years of inflation at the present rate without adjustment of the surtax scale will push him higher still, and make it almost impossible for him to find the new capital needed each year.

Partner 6's marginal rate of tax is 10*s* 5*d* (8/9 × 11*s* 9*d*). It, too, will rise sharply as his income rises. Partner 10 is still only paying at 6*s* 5*d*, but that will not last for long.

Possible solutions

The inescapable conclusion is that unless most practitioners are to be blessed with inherited wealth, there will be a crisis in the profession since it will soon quite simply become impossible to finance out of savings the capital requirements of any but small firms. Possible solutions are:

(1) A substantial reduction in tax rates.

(2) An end to inflation or the introduction of an allowance for it in computing taxable 'profits'.

(3) Borrowing – whether by individual partners or by the firm.

(4) Allowing the introduction of outside equity capital.

Tax rates and inflation depend on the grace and favour of governments, which seem little disposed to show them. Probably the next Conservative Government will do something about surtax; almost certainly it will do too little and after a few years of inflation we shall be back where we are today.

The trouble about borrowing today is quite simply that with inflation as it is nobody wishes to lend at fixed rates. Banks still cling to the theory that their advances are temporary and should not be made to persons who cannot demonstrate a likelihood of repayment in the reasonably near future. In any event the arbitrary interference of governments with the normal functioning of banks has reached such a point that any firm would think twice before running the risk of being suddenly made insolvent almost by degree.

We are left with the need for outside equity capital, and it is suggested that very earnest consideration be given to this idea, drastically new though it be. Financial necessity has forced it on the Stock Exchange; it is also acceptable among professional engineers, and it is submitted that the accountancy profession could follow these precedents without grave harm.

As a first step, the outsider might be a sleeping – probably a limited – partner. In the long run it would be better if legislation permitted unlimited companies to carry out all the professional activities of accountants, with the requirement that there be at least a specified number or proportion of qualified accountants among the directors and shareholders.

New TV Series on Management Accounting

THIS week-end sees the start of a new BBC Television series of ten weekly programmes on management accountancy. Intended primarily for accountancy and management students, it should nevertheless prove to be of interest to already-qualified accountants – both in industry and public practice – and to managers who are interested in learning about the financial aspects of running a business.

The programmes are based on dramatic sequences located in the factory of Hardy Heating Co Ltd, a firm that was specially created for the series. A small Midlands manufacturing company with a payroll of 200 employees, it is in the electrical appliance and equipment industry, and has an annual turnover of £350,000 – rising steadily, if unspectacularly, by 7–10 per cent each year.

During the course of the ten weekly episodes, the programmes will deal with the main aspects of management accountancy and relate the various techniques to the day-to-day problems encountered by the company's management.

Principal characters

The principal characters in the series are Jack Hardy, the managing director (played by Raymond Mason of Z Cars); John Marsh (Harvey Hall of The Avengers and Danger Man), a 30 years old chartered accountant who joins the company as its chief accountant; Sam Howell (Ivan Beavis of Coronation Street), the abrasive works director; and Jean Wilkins (Alethea Charlton) who is John Marsh's assistant and book-keeper.

John Marsh's appointment as chief accountant of Hardy Heating Co is the outcome of a conversation that Jack Hardy has on the golf course with the senior partner of the company's auditors, when they are discussing the problems of controlling a business that has become too large for one man to manage on his own. Marsh comes to the job in the face of opposition from Sam Howell, who reckons he gets by well enough without an accountant to tell him anything – a situation which is probably familiar to many real-life accountants who find themselves in similar circumstances.

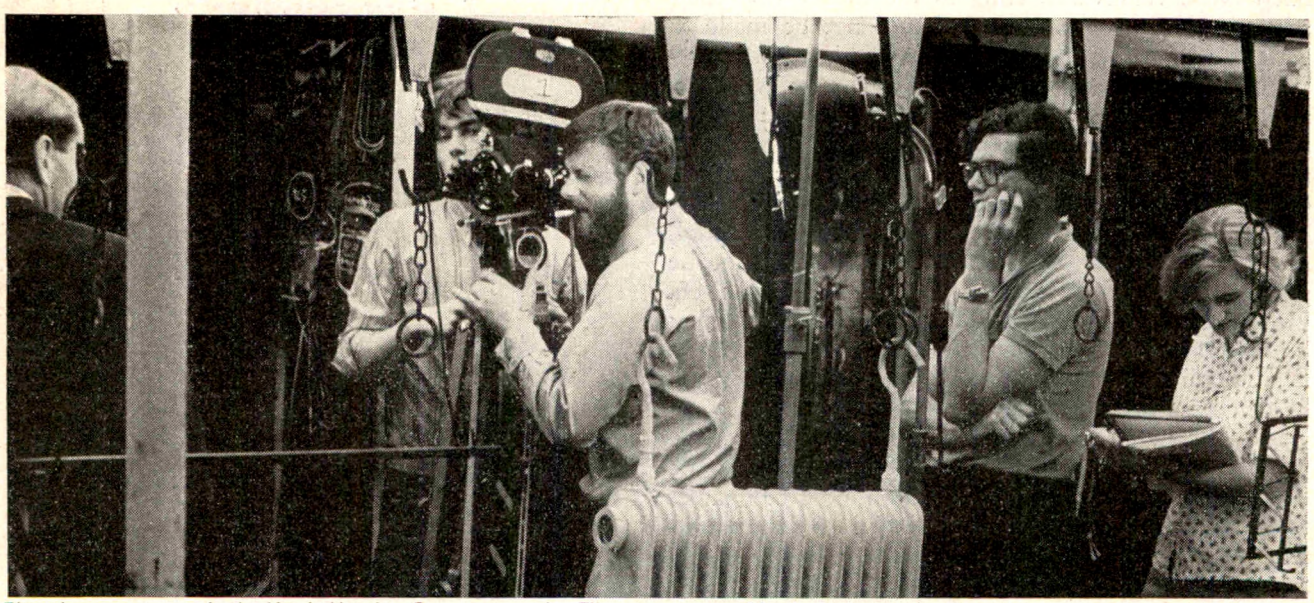
By his skilful use of situation drama techniques, the programme's producer, Paul Ellis, creates a true-to-life setting for the meetings and discussions that precede decision-making in a business such as Hardy Heating Co, and throughout the series viewers are able to relate the instructional material to the background of the workshop production line and the accountant's office.

Linking commentary

Graham Turner, the BBC's Economics Correspondent (author of The Car Makers and The North Country), will provide a linking commentary, in the course of which he will use visual aids to explain the salient points that are dealt with in each episode.

In conjunction with this series, BBC Publications has produced an invaluable handbook of background material comprising a full range of explanatory texts and cases related to the individual programmes. The chapter headings are:

(1) The accountant – the information manager
(2) The balance sheet
(3) The profit and loss account
(4) Accounting ratios
(5) Cost classifications and product costing



Shooting a sequence in the Hardy Heating Company works. Film cameraman, Martin Bell; director, Paul Ellis, and assistant, Gill Doughty.

(6) Accounting in planning and control
(7) Standards and flexible budgets for control
(8) Planning for operations and profit
(9) Planning for funds
(10) The planning and control of capital expenditure.

The texts and cases for this publication were prepared by Graham Ray, A.C.A., lecturer in the School of Management at Bath University of Technology, and Joe Smith, F.C.W.A., senior lecturer in the Department of Industrial Administration at the University of Aston in Birmingham. Starting from the balance sheet and profit and loss account, they give a series of practical examples which follow the chapter headings listed above and are directly related to those used in the visual situations in the TV episodes. The handbook provides a worth-while instructional textbook in its own right and is likely to be used as such long after the series has finished. The handbook, entitled Hardy Heating Co Ltd, is obtainable from booksellers or the BBC at 17*s* 6*d*.

Notable development

Although this is not the first occasion on which management accountancy has formed the subject of a TV series (readers of The Accountant may recall the earlier series, Fothergale & Co Ltd), it does represent a notable development in instructional techniques as applied to an advanced professional skill such as accountancy, and the reaction of accountants, students and educationists will be noted with particular interest by BBC Television as a guide to future planning of further education programmes of this nature.

The BBC's readiness to tackle a complex subject such as management accountancy deserves high praise and we look forward to seeing the results as the series progresses. The producer, Paul Ellis, has gone to considerable lengths to ensure the authenticity and accuracy of the material used in the series and in March of last year he invited a group of company directors, accountants and technical college lecturers (including representatives of The Accountant) to the television studio to see a pilot film of the first episode. During a discussion which followed this viewing, he invited their criticisms to assist him in planning the format of the series.

The Hardy Heating Co Ltd programmes will be supported by a BBC Radio 3 series Managing the Economy, in which an analysis will be made of the relationship between Government and industry. Dealing with such problems as the balance of payments, economic growth, prices and incomes, and fiscal policy, it will explain the significance of Government policy for firms such as Hardy Heating Co when they are planning their own futures.

These programmes can be seen or heard at the following times:

Ten programmes weekly on Sundays at 11.30 a.m. from January 12th to March 16th.

Managing the Economy – Radio 3

by MARTIN CARROLL, C.P.A.

With the recent announcement that Lord Cromer, with the assistance of Sir Alexander Johnston – until lately, Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue – is to lead an inquiry into the long-term aspects of Lloyd's underwriting membership and activities, this article has particular significance and topicality.

THE descriptions 'underwriter' and 'underwriting' are specially associated with Lloyd's, although these terms are also used in the capital market and by the insurance companies. Lloyd's is a professional association whose underwriters either conduct their operations in 'the Room' or are associated in 'Syndicates' with such members.

A member may belong to one or more syndicates, being generally referred to as a 'Name' to distinguish him individually from the other participators in a syndicate. The underwriter who conducts the business of the syndicate at Lloyd's in a full-time capacity may claim the benefit of earned income relief, but associated names and, of course, those not resident in the United Kingdom may not be afforded such relief.

Funds

There are a number of 'Underwriting Funds' established in which the name is either a compulsory or voluntary participator. These are:

(1) Lloyd's deposits.

(2) Premiums trust fund deposits.

(3) Special reserve funds.

(4) Personal reserve funds.

A Lloyd's deposit is initiated when an individual is accepted as a member of Lloyd's. This deposit can, in fact, be financed and owned by a wife, relative or some other third party. The investments, which represent the deposit, are held in the name of the Corporation of Lloyd's. The premiums trust fund and the personal reserves are measures to enable investments to be held to safeguard, or at least bolster, the financial security of the name.

Special reserve fund

The special reserve fund is an arrangement originally introduced by the Finance Act 1949, and incorporated with section 480 and the Twenty-first Schedule of the Income Tax Act 1952. The appropriate limitations were increased from the original 25 per cent or £1,500, whichever was the less, to the figure now applicable and effective from the fiscal year 1965–66. The final variation was made by section 3 of the Finance Act 1955 and the limitation is now the lesser of 50 per cent or £7,000. In strictness, 35 per cent or £5,000 are the limits provided by the Finance Act 1952 and the balance of 15 per cent or £2,000 are the limits of the additional relief allowed in the Finance Act 1955.

Lloyd's underwriters are personally liable on policies to which their names are annexed. They are therefore trading, and would normally be liable to income tax and surtax on their profits. To relieve the disparity between them and the shareholders of insurance companies, the arrangements (statutorily introduced as detailed above) were approved by the Inland Revenue and certified as in the public interest by the Board of Trade.

By these arrangements underwriters are permitted to create special reserve funds to meet losses and obtain surtax relief on payments into those funds. They are required to pay surtax on withdrawals from the funds, except on death, and for periods up to April 5th, 1966, they were liable to profits tax on their underwriting profits subject to a deduction corresponding to the limit of directors' remuneration which would have been allowed to a controlling director of a limited company. The deduction was latterly £3,000 or, if greater, 15 per cent of the profits before charging such remuneration. This profits tax would not have been available against the underwriter's income tax liability but, grossed at standard rate, it would have been deductible for surtax purposes.

The name or syndicate issue a notice of adherence to the scheme and this may be subsequently withdrawn. Such a cancellation, however, precludes his re-entry to the scheme. He may create as many special reserve funds as desired but each must be allocated to a separate syndicate of which he is a member. He may apportion, at will between these funds, any sum up to the amount he is authorized to transfer annually under the scheme.

There is a requirement that each fund should be in the trusteeship of at least the syndicate's underwriting agent and the Society of Lloyd's. The capital, represented by the investments made, and the income, is held in trust for the underwriter, his personal representatives or his assigns. On the occasion of a cessation, the funds will be released by the trustees and the amount released will be treated as a payment from the funds for surtax purposes. On death, this release will be treated as capital and, although liable to estate duty, will not be liable to income tax or surtax.

The limitation, previously detailed, is stated to be such a sum which, grossed at standard rate, does not exceed the lesser of £7,000 or 50 per cent of the underwriting profits for the calendar year which is the base year for the year of assessment. Profits, for this purpose, are those assessable under Case I of Schedule D with the addition of the underwriter's gross investment income and Case VII gains from all his underwriting funds. From this is deducted an amount equal to his grossed-up profits tax. The net figure is certified by the relative inspector at City 18 District on Form LL.1.

Should the name make a loss in a subsequent year, a payment must be made from the special reserve funds equal to the loss or to the capital of the funds if the loss is greater than this sum. The loss is computed in the same way as profits, so that if the Case I loss is small enough and does not exceed the investment income, he may still be permitted to transfer to his special reserve funds in spite of the Case I loss. The capital of the funds is measured by the value when transferred to the funds and not current market value.

Where there is an overall loss it is, therefore, obligatory to withdraw a corresponding amount from the funds and this amount, grossed at standard rate, becomes part of the underwriter's total income for the year of loss. Section 341 relief for the Case I loss can then be claimed against that total income, including the special reserve funds release.

The computation is as follows:

Case I profit
Investment income:
Lloyd's deposit
Investment premiums (including US dividend)
Premium trust fund
Personal reserve funds
Special reserve funds
Short-term gains (less losses) on Lloyd's funds
Deduct	(A)
Gross equivalent of profit tax (if any) $\frac{80}{47}\times$
50 per cent thereof (or £7,000, whichever is less)
Maximum gross transfer	£

Losses

Net transfer from the fund where the aggregation at (A) is a loss is $\frac{47}{80}$ multiplied by the loss.

(This format roughly follows the lines used by the Inland Revenue on Form LL.16.)

In the case of a new member, no payment into the funds can be made in the first or second year of assessment. Thereafter no payment can be made, in respect of a year's profits, after the expiration of six months from the date the Revenue deem the accounts of the relative underwriting year to be closed. This may be extended on application to the Commissioners and the payment is rateably adjusted for parts of a year. In any year of assessment, should notice of withdrawal from the scheme be given, consideration must be given to the previous year of assessment. The underwriting or calendar year, deemed by the Revenue to be closed within that year, is the base year for the last applicable year of assessment.

Assessment

Two methods of assessment are applicable. Underwriters elected to Lloyd's before April 6th, 1922, may be assessed on a concessionary basis. This makes the base year two years before the normal or statutory prior-year basis. Thus, the normal basis for 1968–69 is the calendar year 1967 but the 'special' basis will be the underwriting or calendar year 1965.

The balance reflected by a year's underwriting is comprised of three elements. There is the pure, or actual, profit or loss on underwriting, dividends and interest from invested funds and capital gains or losses arising from those investments.

Dividend and interest arising and unearned income are treated as being part of the name's income from investments for the year in which the income is received. For this purpose the calendar year and the fiscal year are considered to be coterminous.

The syndicate accountants normally notify the name's accountants of the details for return purposes and of the figures agreed with the inspector. Confirmation is usually received from the inspector at City 18 District on Form LL.9, the lower half of which is retained by him and provides the Inland Revenue's control for the underwriting year.

Losses

In spite of the special method of computing the losses for the purposes of the special reserve funds, the relief of the Case I pure loss may be dealt with under normal income tax rules. Assuming that such a loss is incurred in the calendar year 1967, the name may claim relief against income tax and surtax paid or payable on his 1967–68 assessments on income from all sources, including his 1966 underwriting profit, under section 341, Income Tax Act 1952. He may alternatively claim relief against income from all sources for the year 1968–69 within the provisions of section 15, Finance Act 1953, or carry the loss forward against future underwriting profits under section 342, Income Tax Act 1952.

If the underwriter is entitled to earned income relief, losses must first be set against earned income but, for the other members, losses will be offset against unearned income in the first instance.

As the withdrawal from the special reserve funds is based on the original transfer value, any capital appreciation is available for the benefit of the name's underwriting. This is subject to the incidence of capital gains tax if the investments are sold. It could, therefore, be advantageous for him to request the syndicate, if the cash position allows, to 'fund' the loss or part of it and offset it against future profits due to him. In this way the investments may not have to be sold and capital gains tax can be avoided. The agent may, in such circumstances, require the name to hold the investments in his personal reserves until the losses have been fully offset.

It is interesting to note that, when an underwriter is assessed on the conventional basis, his profits are assessed on the same basis up to the date of cessation within the year of assessment in which the cessation occurs. Profits which have been earned before cessation and, on the conventional basis, would have been assessable after that date are ignored. Losses follow these rules and section 341 claims are only competent to the date of cessation. For this purpose, profits or losses assessable in the final year of assessment are time-apportioned to the date of cessation.

Generally

The inspector at City 18 District will annually send an outline computation for completion under cover of letter LL.19. This working-sheet is Form LL.16, the left half relating to profits tax, whilst this is still applicable, and the right half to the transfer to special reserve funds.

He will agree the profits tax liability, using Form LL.23, or agree 'NIL' liability using Form LL.23A. Form LL.23 is normally sent in duplicate. The lower half requires the underwriter's agreement and is detached and returned to the inspector. Form LL.23A certifies the loss to be carried forward, where necessary. There is an amplification in Form LL.23A (1), which in addition, agrees the balance held in the special reserve fund at the close of the underwriting year.

The inspector uses Form LL.31 to indicate his intention to certify a loss as he is required to do by paragraph 7 (3) (a) of Schedule 21, Income Tax Act 1952. After thirty days he will issue the certificate of loss on Form LL.32.

Profits tax ceases to be chargeable from April 6th, 1966. The 1966 account will, therefore, be assessable on one-quarter of its profit.

United States underwriting

Some underwriting and investment arises in the United States and a tax liability results. The US tax liability is a composite amount made up as follows:

(i) Capital gains and interest not liable to UK tax for the relative calendar year. There is no relief for US tax borne on this income.

(ii) For the same year, the interest, dividends and short-term gains liable to UK tax. The net amount, after US withholding tax, is assessed on the syndicate on a current year basis under Case IV or Case VII. The name should be advised of the share attributed to him.

(iii) For the same year, dividends from Lloyd's sterling trust fund investments. In this case the UK tax is deducted at source by the paying agent after allowing a provisional tax credit relief.

(iv) The underwriting profit of three years previously, which will have been already assessed in the UK on a legal or a conventional basis.

(v) Any other US income.

Any relief due or additional tax chargeable will be adjusted by using the relevant calendar year as the base year for the legal or conventional basis.

The 'pure' profits of his underwriting, by the United States citizen, can be deemed to be earned income even though earned income relief may not be available in the UK. By virtue of section 911 of the US Internal Revenue Code he may then claim exemption from US tax of up to $20,000, since the US taxes its citizens and not only its residents. This applies to a period of residence for over a taxable year. After three years the exemption increases to $25,000.

Short-term gains

A charge to income tax and surtax was imposed by the Finance Act 1962 on gains arising from the acquisition and disposal of chargeable assets where the intervening period was less than six months. The period was extended to twelve months where assets were acquired after April 6th, 1965. Whilst it is still applicable, these gains are also subject to profits tax.

Long-term gains

The Finance Act 1965 imposed a charge to capital gains tax, for 1965–66 and subsequently, on gains arising from disposals of chargeable assets where a charge has not been made under the Case VII rules. The tax is normally at a flat rate of 30 per cent on gains arising after and accruing after April 6th, 1965. There is a deemed disposal every fifteen years on trusts with no life interest in possession but this rule does not apply to any of the Lloyd's trust funds.

For investments forming part of Lloyd's American trust fund, the Inland Revenue will accept the 'Budget Day 1965' values given by the First National City Bank. A list of these values is available for reference at the American trust fund office.

It is believed to be advantageous, in most cases, to have capital gains assessed on both Additional Securities Ltd, 6 per cent Unsecured Loan Stock, and Lloyd's Building Ltd Preference Shares on a straight-line basis rather than by reference to Budget Day 1965 value.

'Long-term' gains and losses are not brought into the calculation of transfers to special reserve funds or of profits tax liabilities.

The trustees of the various underwriting funds will usually be assessed for capital gains tax on gains realized from the disposal of investments comprising these funds. The procedure agreed with the Inland Revenue is that, for Lloyd's deposits, the gains or losses will be assessed on the amounts arising in the fiscal year. The Committee of Lloyd's will make the returns and notify the name of his share. Tax will be paid and charged to the name's Lloyd's deposit.

Where the deposit is beneficially owned wholly or in part by his wife or a third party, the information should be passed on. Where new members are elected, care should be taken to see that section 75, Finance Act 1965, does not apply. Careful planning can minimize capital gains and avoid the possibility that financing loans to new members could be deemed distributions in close companies.

For premiums trust fund deposits, special reserve funds and personal reserves, the calendar or underwriting year will be treated as being coterminous with the fiscal year. The underwriting agent will make the return, tax being assessed on him. Tax will be charged to the particular fund of the name and the amount advised, usually to the name's personal accountant.

Where there is a liability to capital gains tax, a provision should be made for it before reinvestment of the proceeds. Alternatively the tax may be met by the name from his own resources.

If the agent credits the name with 70 per cent of realized and unrealized gains and charges the name with 70 per cent of the losses, a reserve can be built up against the future payment of capital gains tax.

To all of these transactions the normal rules of capital gains computation and assessment apply. Members not resident and not ordinarily resident in the UK are only liable on assets situated in the UK. They will not be liable on gains arising from investments in the American trust fund, nor on Canadian dollar premiums, nor yet again on gains from 4 per cent Victory Bonds, 4 per cent Funding Stock 1960–90 and 3½ per cent War Loan.

Double taxation relief is applicable and, in the special case of residents of the Irish Republic who are not resident or ordinarily resident in the UK, they will not be liable even on gains from assets used for the purpose of their underwriting in the UK.

No gains tax on transfers between funds

Transfers between funds, or between the name and any of his funds, do not give rise to capital gains tax as there is no alteration in beneficial ownership. This does not apply to the investments in the general pool of the premiums trust fund unless they are specifically allocated to a name. Since each fund will have been treated separately for assessment, there will have been no automatic offsetting or adjustments between funds. It should, therefore, be arranged with the Inland Revenue that adjustments should be made where a loss on one fund can be offset against a gain on another and where a loss or gain on a Lloyd's fund can be combined with a gain or loss on personal transactions.

In strictness, since all of the assets are in the same beneficial ownership, where LIFO or FIFO principles are applicable and the rules of identification must be followed, the acquisition or disposal of a certain share in a Lloyd's fund could be associated with the disposal or acquisition in another fund or even in personal holdings. In this way, for instance, a gain assessed on the special reserve fund could become a loss on the name's personal holdings. By Inland Revenue concession, this 'matching' of investments need not be made, but in deciding whether advantage is to be taken of this concession, regard should be had to the benefit arising to the name, if any.

The election for cost to be ignored, available under paragraph 1 of Schedule 11, Finance Act 1968, if made, affects all the holdings under the same beneficial ownership as well as the name's personal investments. Separate elections may be made for quoted ordinary shares or fixed interest and preference shares. Agreement has been reached with the inspector at City 18 District that capital gains computations should be provisionally agreed as though no election had been made, unless the name has reported to the Committee of Lloyd's that he has elected or intends to elect. Subsequent adjustments – found to be necessary as a result of an election made within two years of the end of the year of assessment in which the first disposal, after March 19th, 1968, arises, or for some other reason – will be made by the name's general claims district.

Extra-statutory concession

On death, there is a deemed disposal of all assets, but to ease complications there is an extra-statutory arrangement with the Inland Revenue. For the concession, the Committee of Lloyd's must give an indemnity against loss of revenue if the personal representatives insist on the strict legal basis.

By this arrangement the apportioned part of chargeable gains and allowable losses arising or deemed to arise at death or subsequently are deemed to accrue on the occasion of the death. These gains are to be aggregated and, at the end of the running-off period, any alteration in the liability of the personal representatives will be made by additional assessment or repayment. The concession applies only to the premiums trust fund investments including personal reserves when these are in the pool.

Syndicate agents must keep a detailed cumulative record showing the gains and losses realized and unrealized at each year end; the assessments made on the trustees of the fund and the gains realized but not chargeable by virtue of the exempt price range of Government securities or by virtue of paragraph 22 (4) of the Sixth Schedule, Finance Act 1965. The sum of the unchargeable gains and the assessments taken from the total gains and losses will be deemed to represent the unrealized gain or loss at death. For the year of death, time-apportionment must be applied to quantify the part arising before death and that arising on death. A similar record and computation should be made for the running-off period of the deceased name's accounts. Any gain or loss revealed will be deemed to have arisen at death. The trustees will be assessed to the capital gains tax due.

The scheme will also, by concession, apply to names leaving a syndicate.

The inspector at City 18 District will send a summary on Form LL.200 of the capital gains figures reported to him from underwriting funds. The form will be sent under cover of Form LL.202 which gives detailed instructions for claiming any relief due. Form LL.235 sets out in detail the extra-statutory concession on death, the relative figures being reported on Form LL.232. Both these forms relate to the year of death. For the years after that particular year the corresponding forms are LL.236 and LL.233 except in the case of the last year of the running-off period when the covering letter is on Form LL.237.

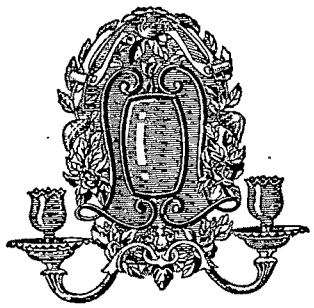
Special charge

The 'special charge' imposed by the Finance Act 1968 applies to investment income for 1967–68 where the total income to which the charge is applicable exceeds £3,000 plus the surtax personal allowances. The legislation is similar to the conditions surrounding the 1948 'special contribution' and the Inland Revenue intend to interpret it in the same way.

The Board of Inland Revenue have agreed that the income brought into account for calculating transfers to the special reserve fund will be that within the definition of the classes of income excluded from the charge. It includes underwriting profit, whether the name is employed at Lloyd's or not, and the relative investment income normally added to this. The fact that a name is not entitled to earned income relief does not prevent the profit being excluded from the charge.

As a corollary, losses may not be deducted from investment income which is included for the purpose of the special charge, and transfers to and from the special reserve fund must neither be deducted nor included.

It will have been noted that City 18 District is the specialist district for underwriters. They are usually of immense assistance in helping to minimize any problems arising from this particular facet of taxation.



The Accountant Annual Awards

Closing Date for Entries for 1969 Awards

COMPANIES wishing to enter their reports and accounts presented at annual meetings held in 1968 for consideration for The Accountant Annual Awards to be made this year – the sixteenth year of the Awards – are reminded that the closing date is January 31st.

Entries should be addressed to The Secretary, The Accountant Annual Awards, 151 Strand, London WC2. The only condition of entry is that companies' shares are quoted on a recognized Stock Exchange in the United Kingdom.

A large number of annual reports have already been received for the consideration of the Panel of Judges, which is under the chairmanship of MR ROY BORNEMAN, Q.C. This year the Panel has been joined by MR PETER BARING, a managing director of Baring Brothers & Co, and MR PETER C. BARNETT, a member of the Council of the London Stock Exchange and a partner in a firm of stockbrokers. They take the places of the Hon. J. F. H. Baring and Mr J. A. Hunter who were members of the Panel for several years. The other members are:

MR ROBERT ADAMS, C.A., a former member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland and a partner in a firm of chartered accountants.

MR T. A. HAMILTON BAYNES, M.A., F.C.A., a former member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

MR W. G. CAMPBELL, B.A., F.C.A., a former member of the Restrictive Practices Court and of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

MR J. A. JACKSON, F.C.A., a member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales and a partner in a firm of chartered accountants.

MR IAN T. MORROW, C.A., F.C.W.A., a Past President and a member of the Council of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants; also a prominent figure in industry.

SIR HILARY SCOTT, a Past President of The Law Society, a partner in a firm of solicitors and a former member of the Jenkins Committee on Company Law.

MR ARTHUR E. WEBB, Editor of The Accountant.

The Accountant Annual Awards were instituted in 1954 to encourage the preparation by public companies of clearer and more informative reports and accounts. Two Awards are made each year, one to large companies and the other to smaller companies requiring less complex accounts than those of a large group. In 1968 the Awards were made to Selection Trust Ltd and Hargreaves Group Ltd.

Taxation Cases

Wolf Electric Tools Limited v. Wilson

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

November 26th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Business in India – Transferred to Indian company – In return for shares in that company – Whether value of shares an income receipt.

The appellant company's trade was mainly the manufacture of electric power tools, and it produced about fifty different models. In the course of development the company evolved various production methods and also drawings, jigs, processes and schedules of manufacture. These were valuable assets of the company and were kept in strict security.

The company began to trade with India in 1932 through an agent. After the war the Indian Government developed the policy of persuading the setting up of local businesses for making tools, and the company's agent, an Indian company (Ralli) pointed out the adverse effect the policy would have on the company's business. In 1958 an Indian company (Ralliwolf) was incorporated, and in the following year Ralli agreed to take 55 per cent of the shares in Ralliwolf, and the appellant company's holding company agreed to take 45 per cent of the shares. The consent of the Indian Government to the formation of Ralliwolf was given conditionally on Ralli being the majority shareholder.

A few days later the appellant company agreed to provide Ralliwolf with all present and future drawings, designs, schedules and technical knowledge and data necessary for the establishment of a factory for the production of certain ranges of portable electric tools, and to assign to Ralliwolf all the Indian patents, and the benefit of all future inventions relating to the selected tools. The facilities so agreed to be provided to Ralliwolf were to be exclusive to that company. These arrangements were to last for ten years subject to cancellation by mutual consent. The appellant company also agreed to transfer plant and equipment to enable Ralliwolf to begin work in its Indian factory. The consideration was 5,375 shares for the transfer of the plant and equipment, and 3,625 shares for the supply of drawings, designs, schedules, technical knowledge and data. Only these 3,625 shares were in dispute.

It was contended for the appellant company (i) that the facilities provided for Ralli, for which it had issued the 3,625 shares to the appellant company, constituted a capital asset of the appellant company's trade; (ii) that the giving of these facilities was not an activity of the appellant company's trade; (iii) that this disclosure was an investment operation; (iv) alternatively, that the 3,625 shares represented a 'keep-out' payment and not a trade receipt. It was contended for the Revenue (i) that the transaction was a natural development of the appellant company's technique for exploiting the Indian market; (ii) that there had not been an outright sale but merely an assignment for ten years in respect of the selected tools only, and the appellant company was not excluded from India in respect of other tools; (iv) that the 3,625 shares were trade receipts for telling another firm how to make the selected tools. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the Revenue.

Held: the 3,625 shares were received by the appellant company as part of a comprehensive arrangement whereby, as to the selected tools, the company gave up its business in India; and that the shares were a capital asset of the appellant company.

Westcott v. Bryan

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

November 28th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Emoluments – Director – Occupation of house owned by company – Expenses and rateable value of house – Whether apportionable – Basis of apportionment – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 160, 161 – Schedule 9, paragraph 7.

The taxpayer occupied a house (Parkfields) owned by a company of which he was managing director. The house was larger than he would have occupied but for the company's insistence that he should live in it in order to entertain customers. It was in North Staffordshire, whereas he would have wished to live in London. The entertainment of visitors was of great importance, for more than 60 per cent of the company's production was exported, and buyers made frequent visits to the company's premises in a rural area in North Staffordshire. The tenancy was a yearly one, and the taxpayer paid the company a rent of £140 and also £500 for services. He also paid the rates, but the company paid the cost of the services.

An additional assessment for 1963–64 was made on the taxpayer in respect of (a) the whole of the cost of gas, electricity, water, insurance of contents, cleaning and maintenance of parklands; (b) a proportion of the telephone charges and gardener's emoluments. Those expenses, plus the proportion at (b) came to £1,017. In addition to this sum the computation included the rateable value, £360. From the total of £1,377 there was deducted the £640 paid by the taxpayer to the company, leaving a balance of £737. Ten-twelfths of that sum, namely, £614, was the amount of the assessment because the taxpayer's tenancy began on June 1st, 1963.

It was contended for the taxpayer (i) that the company's expenditure, the £1,017, should be apportioned, in that it represented expenditure on accommodation for the taxpayer as well as accommodation and facilities for the company's visitors; (ii) that the assessment should be reduced to nine-tenths of £95. It was contended for the Revenue (i) that the whole of the £1,017 was within section 161 of the Income Tax Act 1952 and was properly included in the computation; (ii) that the assessment of £614 should be confirmed. The General Commissioners decided to allow one-quarter of the total expense for business purposes. That left £1,032, less the taxpayer's contribution, £640, and they confirmed the assessment in the resulting £392.

Held: the General Commissioners' decision was correct.

Cabinet Appointment for Mr Maurice Stans

MR MAURICE H. STANS, who served as President of the American Institute in 1954–55, is to be Secretary of Commerce in Mr Richard Nixon's administration which takes office on January 20th.

In the previous Republican administration of President Eisenhower, Mr Stans was Budget Director. He had earlier undertaken other Government work such as a study – for more than a year – of postal operations for the United States Postmaster-General.

Conglomerate Concealment

AS the rash of mergers spreads – even bringing British Petroleum across the Atlantic into a record £600 million transaction – demands for new accounting concepts mount. Some of the techniques adopted by the merger-merchants have been dubbed 'dirty pool' by Wall Street spokesmen, so that a first-class row seems unavoidable. Less spectacular but no less real disagreements have been stirred up by the question of how much a group, once merged, should be required to disclose concerning its more diversified activities. There has been some feeling that the accounts of such groups may be serving to conceal, rather than reveal, the truth.

This problem must come to a head in the very near future when the Securities and Exchange Commission announces the outcome of its review of the reaction of industry and the profession to its proposals for fuller disclosure. The proposals were partly inspired by a statement from the Accounting Principles Board of the American Institute issued as long ago as September 1967. By British standards, this called for quite radical changes, including the reporting of turnover and profit (or loss, for that matter) by separate types of activity and even by type of customer. Nor has American opinion been mild in its reply. Some companies have concentrated on considering ways in which industry subdivisions – such as manufacturing, agriculture and so on – can be made so innocuous as to be almost worthless to the investing public. Others have aimed their criticisms at the dangers implicit in over-radical proposals.

One problem concerns the definition of a 'material' subdivision of company activities. The proposed 10 per cent is considered too low, especially for a small – but doubtless soaring – company, and enjoys much less support than the usual 15 per cent test.

The proposal that management should be asked to disclose the results of foreign operations is even more controversial and could prove embarrassing to companies owned in Britain or having the bulk of their foreign interests there. It has also been explained that the proposals could upset not merely the new conglomerates but also established companies in such industries as steel and engineering. Shell has pointed out the difficulty of drawing any meaningful line between its oil and chemical activities.

Recently, the Accounting Principles Board added its voice to the chorus of criticism. In a letter to the SEC it suggested that they were going too far. Yet it reaffirmed its support for an attack on the inadequate information provided in the reports of some of the conglomerates. The Board hopes both to see a continuation of improvements in this area, and in due course to come forward with an outline of acceptable practice.

AUSTRALIA

Institute's Annual Report

ATTENTION of members is drawn in the annual report of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Australia to some new ethical rulings of the Council of the Institute. These rulings have brought into line with those of the English Institute such matters as names on letter-heads, advertising of investment opportunities, specialist services, and management consulting.

Membership of the Institute at June 30th, 1968, numbered 5,331, compared with a total of 5,212 in the previous year. An analysis of the grand total shows that there were 2,918 members in New South Wales, 1,190 in Victoria, 457 in Queensland, 325 in South Australia, 325 in Western Australia, and 116 in Tasmania.

The report refers to an unsatisfactory standard of performance at the Institute's examinations during the year under review. The reason for this, in the opinion of the examiners, is once again that candidates sit each half-year without adequate preparation.

The Education Committee has not been idle, however, and upon investigation has concluded that there are a number of unsatisfactory features of the educational requirements for membership, and has proposed changes which it feels should strengthen the examinations and facilitate exemptions from the Intermediate levels for those who have qualified with recognized tertiary educational bodies, i.e., universities, colleges of advanced education, and technical colleges. The first step in strengthening Institute examinations is the introduction of annual supplementaries to them, which are in line with the academic year of such bodies. This has been done for the two main purposes of facilitating teaching for an examination with a full year of preparation, and also to make it more important for the student to be properly prepared when he presents himself.

The highlight of the year was the Fourth Australian Congress held in Hobart, as reported in The Accountant of June 29th, which was attended by 316 members from all states of the Commonwealth of Australia, and also by distinguished guests from overseas, including Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., then Deputy President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales.

Finance and Commerce

Capital Finance Co

TROUBLES, as everyone who has experienced them knows, never come singly and Capital Finance Co, having experienced trouble over the Rolls Razor crash, is now in trouble over the Cyril Lord company's collapse. But the report of the auditors, Thomson McLintock & Co, accompanying the 1967–68 accounts, shows clearly enough that problems are not merely concerned with these two points.

The company has been virtually kept in being by the Standard Life Assurance Co, and by the patience of the company's bankers. It should also be appreciated that the auditors' comments refer to the situation as at January 31st, 1968, at which time the position in various subsidiaries was still being worked out. Section (ii) of the auditors' report, for example, refers to the Hayes & Walker subsidiary which has been almost completely run down now and also to Snow Investments which has been entirely reorganized.

Sections (iv) and (v) refer to the London motor hire-purchase finance groups and the deficiencies referred to all relate to periods before the two groups came under their present management. The accounting of these two groups is now up-to-date.

Thomson McLintock, incidentally, became auditors to the group in 1967 and have now been appointed auditors of all but one of the subsidiaries.

Remedial measures

In his statement with the accounts the chairman, Mr F. S. Jamieson, reminds shareholders that the present board and management only took over in May 1967 and inherited a situation of 'serious accounting deficiencies in certain important subsidiaries and associated companies and a lack of proper documentation in connection with some injudicious transactions outside the hire-purchase field'.

Mr Jamieson points out that it was not possible in many cases to decide on remedial measures or to start a process of disentanglement until up-to-date figures were available and the exact legal position known. The complexities of some of the arrangements uncovered and the lack of documentation were such that ascertainment of the true financial position has taken many months to achieve and in some cases has not yet been achieved even now.

Special provisions made in the previous accounts had in certain cases to be decided on without up-to-date figures and on the basis of estimates given by managements of certain associated concerns. Some of these estimates subsequently proved 'erroneous' and that is the main cause of the further provisions now considered prudent. From the notes to the profit and loss account it will be seen that the great majority of these provisions refer to transactions of previous years.

Loss in detail

OPERATING RESULTS

The following table gives an approximate break-down of the group operating loss, with comparative figures for the preceding year:

Finance	Year ended January 31st 1968	1967
Normal hire-purchase and credit finance business ..	— £35,000	—£150,000
Other finance operations ..	— 350,000	— 486,000
	—£385,000	—£636,000

Motor trading
Grange/Headstone	−£385,000	−£135,000
Tebroc/Noel Bell (since August 1967)	− 109,000	—
Moto Baldet	+ 2,000	− 14,000
Glasgow (now closed down) ..	− 23,000	− 41,000
	−£515,000	−£190,000
Total loss	−£900,000	−£826,000

The position in normal hire-purchase and credit business improved, but under 'other finance operations' the group was still carrying the cost of sums raised to finance investments which, at present, produce little or no income. Under the motor trading heading the Grange/Headstone result was 'a most disastrous setback'. Management dismissals and subsequent changes came too late in the year to have worthwhile effect but a much reduced loss is anticipated this year.

Of exceptional provisions of over £1·8 million the three biggest items refer to the running down of the Hayes & Walker television rental company, the reorganization and writing down of the Tebroc/Noel Bell motor hire-purchase organization, and the writing-off of the £300,033 entire cost of the share investment in Cyril Lord Finance Ltd.

At January 31st, 1968, in addition to the shareholding, Capital Finance had advanced £390,000 by way of loans and had guaranteed certain facilities to Cyril Lord Finance of which £218,000 remained outstanding. When Mr Jamieson compiled his report the loans had increased to £440,000 with the guaranteed amount reduced to £175,000. Debts owing to Cyril Lord Finance (being advances to individual purchasers of Cyril Lord carpets) were all guaranteed by Cyril Lord Ltd, 'but in view of the financial position of the latter and the difficulties which may now be experienced in collecting these debts', the Capital Finance board considered a provision against possible loss prudent – hence the writing-off of the entire cost of the investment.

A further report

A year ago Mr Jamieson talked in terms of the necessity for a drastic capital reorganization. The past lack of up-to-date accounts and the continuing losses have made it impracticable for the board to ask their financial advisers to prepare any scheme. But a further report on the position is promised 'within the next two or three months'. Meanwhile, shareholders are assured of the board's intention to 'expend every effort to continue the improvement in the group's position which has taken place in recent months'.

Clearly the investigation undertaken by Thomson McLintock revealed a position much worse than was anticipated and although that appears to have been covered to a considerable degree, there is the new position with regard to Cyril Lord Finance to be considered and also a generally difficult operating background.

Standard Life, which has subordinated its loan stock and short-term deposits to the extent of £6 million, holds 25 per cent of the Capital Finance equity and is now in charge of the entire operation of the group. Mr Jamieson is Standard Life's investment manager. He and Standard Life are engaged in an extremely costly rescue operation which is only likely to be completed by an extremely drastic capital reorganization.

Capital Finance Company Limited

Report of the Auditors

We report to the members of CAPITAL FINANCE COMPANY LIMITED that:

(i) We have audited the books and records of the company for the year ended 31st January 1968 and, subject to (ii) below, have obtained all the information and explanations which we considered necessary. The foregoing accounts have been properly prepared in accordance with the provisions of the Companies Acts 1948 and 1967. Certain of the subsidiaries have been audited by other firms of accountants.

(ii) Recent audited accounts of certain associated companies, which since 31st January 1968 have become wholly-owned subsidiaries of the company, are not available or are subject to substantial qualification by auditors; accordingly we are unable to express any opinion on the adequacy of the provisions of (a) £380,692 made against anticipated loss on the debts (included in 'advances to associated companies' at an amount, after deduction of such provision, of £221,162) due to the company by such concerns, and (b) £7,775 made against any deficiencies which may emerge in such concerns and fall to be borne by the company.

(iii) In the light of the information and explanations at present available, but subject to Note 24, the other provisions appear to us to be adequate to cover other anticipated losses, but the situation in relation to certain of the (a) advances to other associated companies, and (b) other finance debtors is complex, and such provisions in aggregate may ultimately prove to be more or less than adequate for the purpose.

(iv) Our reports as auditors of a group of wholly-owned subsidiaries acquired during the year contain reservations as follows:—

(a) that certain books of account, examination of which was necessary for the purposes of our audit, were not available to us and, accordingly, we cannot state that proper books of account were kept by certain of these companies,

(b) that we were unable to obtain all the information and explanations which we considered necessary, particularly in respect of (1) lack of adequate vouchers for income and expenditure, principally in the period to 2nd August 1967; (2) the factors giving rise to the substantial trading losses incurred during that period; and (3) the fact that the then auditors of that group had not been able to satisfy themselves as to the amounts included in the accounts at 31st January 1967 for current assets and current liabilities,

(c) that as a result of (iv) (a) and (b) above we are unable to express an opinion as to whether the accounts of such group give a true and fair view of the operating losses for the year ended 31st January 1968, which were shown therein, aggregating £218,259, of which sum £109,129 is included in the amount at line 1 on page 6.

(v) Our reports as auditors of a further group of wholly-owned subsidiaries contain reservations as follows:

(a) that we were unable to obtain all the information and explanations which we considered necessary, particularly in reference to the factors giving rise to the substantial trading losses incurred during the year,

(b) that as a result of (v) (a) above we are unable to express an opinion as to whether the accounts of such group give a true and fair view of the operating losses for the year ended 31st January 1968, which were shown therein, aggregating £384,703.

(vi) In our opinion, subject to the remarks in (ii) and (iii) above, the said accounts give a true and fair view of the state of affairs of the company and of the state of affairs and, subject also to our remarks in (iv) and (v) above and to Note 6, of the loss of the company and its subsidiaries so far as concerns the members of the company.

This is deferred to all other creditors in a winding up. The principal moneys secured by the Loan Stock become immediately payable on the occurrence of certain events detailed in the Schedule to the Minute of Agreement between the company and The Standard Life Assurance Company (the note holder) dated 24th December 1965. The events include: default for twenty-eight days in the payment of interest or acquisition of more than 50 per cent of the Ordinary Stock of the company by a party other than the note holder coupled in both cases with the calling-in of the principal moneys by the note holder; winding up of the company; borrowings of the company exceeding the amount calculated in accordance with the requirements of the Schedule and the note holder giving the company three months' notice in writing; amalgamation of the company with any other company or the acquisition of control by the company of any other company without the consent of the note holder. The borrowings of the company at 31st January 1968 exceeded the amount calculated in accordance with the said Schedule and the interest payments due on 31st July 1967 and 31st January 1968 have not been paid although charged in these accounts. On 20th November 1968 the company received confirmation from the note holder that the latter does not presently intend to give notice requiring repayment and agrees to postponement of payment of the said interest. This confirmation was given without prejudice to the note holder's right to call for payment of such instalments of interest at any time (together with interest on the said instalments for the period of postponement at the rate payable from time to time on deposits placed by the note holder with the company) and to its rights as note holder.

(b) On 20th November 1968 the company received confirmation from The Standard Life Assurance Company that £3,000,000 of their deposits with the company outstanding on 31st January 1968 shall be deferred to all other creditors in a winding up of the company. This agreement is given without prejudice to the right of The Standard Life Assurance Company as depositor to call for repayment of the said deposits at any time in terms thereof but it is not presently intended to do so.

CITY NOTES

HAVING opened 1969 with the traditional New Year salute to the equally traditional mixture of hope and gay abandon, the stock-market may soon have to get down to consideration of what few realities investors are prepared to recognize. One is that an equity market standing well above 500 in terms of The Financial Times industrial share index is probably ignoring the effects of the most severe pressure on credit to which the customers of the banks and the clients of the finance houses have ever been subjected.

The effects of this pressure have yet to be seen in terms of internal demand and the consequent probable run down in the consumer goods industry following the excesses of the much debated 'spending spree' in 1968. The effects have also to be seen of the probable postponement, yet again, of capital investment programmes.

As for the stock-market itself, the effects have still to be felt in terms of capital-raising pressure. In 1968, for the first time in six years, new company money raising by equities was greater in amount than capital raising by loan capital.

At the present respective pitches of the equity and fixed interest market sectors, the new issue emphasis is likely to stay on equities and may well be increased.

Neither is the equity market at present prepared to look ahead as far as a Budget which, more than likely, will include an increase in the rate of corporation tax. For the present, equities are once again living in hope and may prove to be living dangerously.

* * * *

WITH the revival of hope in the stock-markets has inevitably come a revival of take-over rumours. The extent and variety of these shows that, in some cases, rumour spreaders have lost none of their touch nor their ingenuity. Company spokesmen have, on the other hand, lost none of the vehemence with which they deny some of the more outrageous reports. The financial Press is becoming a fine judge of the honest denial, to the chagrin of some of the professionals in the market to whom uncertainty is of more substance than fact. It is not exactly difficult to detect the market-inspired rumour from the rumour which comes from smoke if not fire.

* * * *

THE Industrial Reorganization Corporation, not for the first time, finds itself in a difficult 'judgement of Solomon' kind of position. Two companies – the Weir Group and the American Studebaker-Worthington company – are both bidding for Worthington Simpson as part of, what IRC admits, is needed rationalization in the valves industry. Weir and the American company are agreed that they should co-operate internationally but they cannot apparently agree on which of them is to take over Worthington-Simpson.

They have both agreed to bid at 58*s* a share for Worthington-Simpson but, in the interim, they will try to decide who will, in fact, withdraw and leave the take-over clear to the other. If they cannot decide on that point, then they have agreed to let IRC make the decision.

Worthington-Simpson shareholders, it seems, will have to be satisfied with 58*s*. They, as owners of the company, are apparently not to be allowed any say in the matter. There is to be no 'willing buyer' price for shareholders, no bid battle to find out what the true, open-market price of the shares in bid terms actually is.

An intriguing point is that if Weir are the winning bidders their bid will be in loan paper and therefore not an immediate matter of gains tax. The American company will have to make an all cash bid which will be an immediate gains tax proposition which will suit the Exchequer and will benefit the balance of payments as well. Not that the Government-sponsored IRC would let such matters as gains to the Exchequer and benefits to the balance of payments affect their decision – of course.

Equipment Notes and News

Predicting Return on Capital Investments

TWO new computer programs, known as RECAP and DISCET, are designed primarily for investments in plant, buildings and other resources like ships and aircraft that qualify for investment grants and tax allowances. Both programs have been proved in practice and are now freely available to users of Honeywell Series 200 computers.

The traditional method of representing the return on proposed investments is by the time necessary to recover the capital used (payback period) and the average interest rate. Both these factors are calculated by the programs, together with the still more important evaluations of 'rate of return', the 'present value' of a project and the 'profitability index'. These results are based upon recently developed discounted cash flow techniques that take into account the timing as well as the volume of a cash transaction, the true value of a transaction being dependent on the future date at which it occurs.

Decimal and Metric Conversion Tables

PRODUCED as a service to British Equipment Trades Association member companies but available 'to our industry's clients and friends', is a set of pocket conversion tables for the two major business problems of the next few years, decimalization and metrication.

Produced by BETA in a handy pocket form, it is in three columns, so that if you want to convert, say, 30 centimetres to inches, you look down the centre column to find 30 and then read off under inches '11·8110'. Conversely, if you want to convert 30 or any other number of inches up to 100 to centimetres, you again read down the centre column, but look left under 'cm.' and for 30 find '76·20'.

There are many other conversion tables in length, weight, square and cubic measure, temperature, etc. There are also paper sizes and weight conversions, decimal currency conversion tables or shillings and pence as decimals of £1. A very helpful set of tables.

Deferred Payment Registers

GREAT UNIVERSAL STORES recently signed a contract worth over £200,000 for the supply of deferred payment registers from Automaticket and the Bell Punch Co Ltd, members of the Lamson Industries Group.

As the name implies, these registers record weekly hire-purchase payments and provide the complementary documentation, both for the customer and for subsequent processing by a computer.

When the customer signs the hire-purchase agreement, he is given a wallet envelope containing his weekly payment record and a plastic token embossed with his account number which is eyeletted to the wallet for safety and convenience.

As each instalment is paid, the customer presents his wallet and payment to the cashier who inserts the record card into the top plate of the DP Register and adjusts to the appropriate entry line. The token is inserted into an aperture at the side of the machine. Repayment is then recorded by moving slide levers to the amount being tendered (from 3*d* to £99 19*s* 9*d*) and the handle is turned to complete the operation.

The customer's record card is updated with the amount paid and the date, whilst on a two-part record roll inside the register the account number and the amount are printed out in optical characters. One part is for the shop manager's reference whilst the other is fed into an IBM–OCR reader.

A further operation is also automatically accomplished as the amount paid is recorded into a totalizator visible register at the front of the machine, which is lockable and can only be cleared by an authorized person. Also the register will not operate unless both card and token are inserted, and as the account number is plastic it cannot be incorrectly recorded.

Additionally, the token contains figures giving the nature of the purchase and a check digit to reduce human error in transferring the information elsewhere. Finally, the register's visual record can be checked against the OCR reader totals.

New Computers and Discs

THREE new low-cost computer processes designed solely for direct access applications and four new disc drives have been announced by Honeywell Controls Ltd. Two versions of the model 110 processor, designated 110–2 and 110–3, and a version of the model 125 known as the 125–3 are now able to use the new disc drives. This also enables the price of a minimum system of the series 200 computers to be lowered from £55,000 to less than £45,000.

The four new direct access disc drives – 155, 273, 275 and 278 – have the common characteristics of electronically-controlled read/write head positioning mechanism, a slider-bearing design for the read/write heads, an entirely new electronic non-contact breaking unit and the use of monolithic integrated circuits throughout. They also include a set of brushes that sweep clean across the disc surface during start-up, and a maintenance panel to switch the devices off-line for routine or emergency maintenance.

The 155 is a two-spindle drive which provides low-cost on-line storage of 3·6 million characters of information per unit (1·8 million characters per spindle). Up to four spindles can be connected through one control unit. This drive is for use with the company's model 110 and 125–3 computer systems.

Designed for any series 200 central processor except the model 110, 120 and 125–3, the 273 disc drive is a single spindle unit that uses the new 20-surface disc pack. Each pack provides random access storage of 18·4 million characters of information. Up to eight drive units may be connected to a single control unit.

The 275 is a multiple spindle disc drive with nine 20-surface packs on separate spindles in the same cabinet. Eight are operating units with the ninth as a standby under operator control. This unit is similar to the 273 but combines all 8 units for on-line storage of 147·2 million characters on information.

Also a multiple spindle disc drive the 278 is capable of storing twice the amount of information to the 275 and also transfers at twice the speed (416,667 six-bit characters per second as against 208,333 six-bit characters).

Check Digit Source Documents

TO assist those of their customers who are using invoices and other source documents as computer input, Kenrick and Jefferson Ltd have introduced a scheme of supplying any of these documents with sequential check digit numbering.

A check digit can be defined as a figure, letter or symbol which bears a unique mathematical relationship to the number which it is checking, thus the original number coupled with a check digit is self-checking. Its purpose is to safeguard valuable numeric, alpha or alpha/numeric control data.

Therefore protection is afforded against any form of transcription error by an operator to 100 per cent, but against the random entry of a number (when several digits are wrong) by about 90 per cent, provided the data is put through a check digit verifier before entry. The numbers can also be printed in several optical fonts for OCR readers.

Kenrick and Jefferson Ltd, West Bromwich, Staffs.

Lateral Filing Unit

A SELF-CONTAINED, all metal cabinet, easy to erect and of great rigidity which can contain six rows of lateral filing or seven of shelf filing, has been introduced by G. A. Harvey Office Furniture Ltd. It can also be used for shelf or pigeon-hole filing by substituting the lateral filing rails with the appropriate shelves and dividers. Measuring 7 ft 2 in. high by 3 ft wide by 1 ft 6 in. deep, it is available either open fronted or with a blind or roller shutter.

The lateral files feature pockets both normal and extra capacity which are loaded into the chassis from above, and plastic guides and runner rails allow smooth, no-jump running. Each pocket can be linked to its neighbour by press studs, so that pockets line up evenly and can be quickly assembled. These allow changes to be made with the minimum of trouble. As an optional extra, a pull-out shelf can be provided for lateral or shelf filing. Prices, exclusive of purchase tax, pockets and accessories are £25 for the open front cabinet, £33 15*s* for roller blind and £49 19*s* for shutter assembly.

G. A. Harvey Office Furniture Ltd, Woolwich Road, London SE7.

Metric Paper Sizes

LAST year the papermaking, merchanting and printing industries announced their plans to change over to the metric system, commencing in 1968 and ending in 1970.

To facilitate this changeover, the British Standards Institution recently issued BS 4000, Specification for sizes of Papers and Boards, price 7*s* net.

This useful booklet lists the various sizes of papers for writing, printing, ledger and cover papers, index and pulp boards, drawing papers and so on which are now used in British traditional sizes and which will eventually disappear to be replaced by the new ISO sizes. These specifications cover not only the A sizes of papers which are becoming familiar, but also B sizes, RA and SRA which are untrimmed stock sizes. The booklet is a 'must' for those who have to buy paper of any sort for company use.

New Intercom System

A NEW range of loudspeaking intercom equipment in a variety of attractive finishes has been introduced by Associated Telephones Ltd. Each unit, both master and slave, is of compact design, available in either stainless steel and teak, or stainless steel and a colour range of red, green, blue, topaz, grey, ivory or black.

The master unit measures $9 \times 6 \times 2\frac{1}{4}$ in., each sub-station $6 \times 4\frac{1}{2} \times 2\frac{1}{4}$ in. All systems are direct wired, mains powered, giving 'hands-free' operation, while they can also be linked in to any existing staff paging system to provide further extensions. The master unit has both audible and visual call warning, with individual designation panels lighting up to indicate the caller.

Two systems are available: System One gives the master unit contact with up to 20 slaves. Press button contact gives immediate loud to loud speech with excellent voice reproduction. A six-way system would cost £78 installed by the manufacturers, while lease terms over three or five years are available from the manufacturers. System Two gives full intercommunication between all stations with multi-channel speech, up to a maximum of twenty extensions. The cost of a twelve-way system would be in the region of £360.

Associated Telephones Ltd, 122–128 Arlington Road, London NW1.

Correspondence

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – Following Mr Coulson's reply (December 14th issue) to my letter which you published in your issue of November 30th, perhaps I could be permitted to extend some of the points made in it.

Apart from the obvious waste noted by most members of the merger bodies engaged, like myself, in organizing local talks on the same subjects, competing for similar speakers, swapping dinners, etc., Council representatives have made it clear that the universities would co-operate in appropriate courses for an enlarged Institute but not for the separate Institutes.

It is certainly the educational requirements which concern me most. Any faith I have is lodged in the Council's ability to add standards of personal behaviour to teaching on a university basis as the Medical Council does. District Society committee members who visit schools are already reporting benefits in recruitment from bringing entry standards to two 'A' levels.

The need for an educational change as soon as possible has been supported by managers of men from the merger bodies, both privately and at local meetings around Manchester (controller, Borough Treasurer, etc., level) and by members from the educational field. They also see a threat to the existence of the management accountant which it is up to the accountants themselves to counter by better education – both of themselves and of others – in the necessity for live-wire accountancy of a forward-looking nature.

Members I have met who object to the proposed changes appear still unappreciative of the fact that we have arrived in the computer age proper, with the third generation of computers. For example – children of $12\frac{1}{2}$ years studying the elements of linear programming; binary arithmetic before 10 years; cries from computer papers for a computer within public transport distance of every school in the country; 11,000 systems analysts required by 1970 according to HMSO (not noted for over-optimism); and a Computer Society which has grown from 11,000 to 20,000 membership in about 12 months (parallel to the increase in numbers of third generation machines).

Consider the differing objectives of the practitioner and industrial member. Assuming that tax minimization is common to both (although maybe of differing scales of knowledge) we have the auditor who must report to the proprietors on the results of past periods, check that no misdealings have occurred and sometimes wind up when they have. We also have the management accountant who, if competent, will never need to liquidate, arbitrate or act as receiver or trustee to his own firm and would never be allowed to if it did fail. His job is to help to select the best risk, plan activity up to, say, 10 years forward, and measure performance allowing for technical margins of error.

Can someone please tell me how education for the first can possibly serve for the second? All the improvements in management accountancy which I know of in the last five years have come from algebra and computers. This trend must continue to grow.

There have been a number of published and oral statements on the lowering of standards by associating future students with the 60 per cent of the present membership who, being in industry etc. are assumed to be of lower moral fibre. I submit that the number of times per annum on which an industrial accountant is required to stand up to his management and propound unpalatable truths is likely to be greater than those on which a practitioner considers qualifying an audit report. Furthermore, whereas an auditor on strong ground can rely on other firms refusing to take over the audit and on the rest of his fees, the internal accountant who decides that diplomacy has failed but he is going to take on, say, his chairman, may not be dealing with quite as serious a situation but is on his own. Any damage he may suffer could be personal and permanent, but he's not much good if he can't do it. Good managements recognize and pay for this, surely.

Students require satisfactory leaders on which to pattern themselves. To infer that such leaders are to be found only in practice is patently absurd. Future standards will depend entirely on the determination of the Council to uphold them. In this respect, hardly any publicity has been given to the proposed training requirements. Most large firms will have to organize this on a United Kingdom basis which implies subsistence allowances, since taxation, cash, finance and credit control are often centralized. There will be very many firms who will have to look to themselves to meet the requirements at all. The proposals ought to provide a model for others to follow and certainly make me feel envious of having missed them.

We should not be troubled by any new institutes of accountants if we have the best.

Yours faithfully,

Bowdon, Cheshire. T. E. HEYWOOD, F.C.A.

SIR, – Does Alexander Lindsay (January 4th issue) really exist?

Yours faithfully,

Cottingley, Bingley, Yorks. M. BUCKLEY, F.C.A.

The Professional Image

SIR, – When are we going to have bold and effective leadership from the Councils of the various Institutes so that we can turn our attention again to the work of accountancy and financial advisers, instead of being hopelessly enmeshed in many of the largely irrelevant – to the twentieth century – provisions of the last four Finance Acts?

We are now spending our time conniving in a policy of dividing a national income cake into smaller and smaller parts, and soon there will be nothing left but crumbs; we should be helping to make a bigger cake.

The Councils could advise all practising members that no computations be lodged, that all points in dispute be passed to appeal, and that all appeals to be required to be held before two Special Commissioners, all perfectly legal, together with various other stratagems. This would shut the tax machine down in a very few months and the politicians and theorists of Westminster and Whitehall would then have to take notice.

Previous representations made by the professional bodies clearly have been nothing more than a waste of ink and effort. The ways to make a politician take notice are through the ballot box or money bags.

I must regrettably use a nom de plume as I am no longer a sole practitioner, and remain,

Yours faithfully,

NIMROD.

Capital Expenditure Control

SIR, – The contributed article to your December 7th issue does less than justice to the scope of the DCF method. It did not emphasize that the MAPI method discussed is one of several criteria for evaluating proposals to replace machinery and is a rather specialized technique.

Many companies now recognize that the optimization of its own resources, whether in the form of new issues, depreciation or retained earnings, calls for an approach to investment appraisal using a method which takes into account the time factor, be it cash flow or tax flow, and this is what DCF does.

The limitations of the discounted rate of return in practice are well known; the present value concept, however, is much more meaningful as it will show the time in which mutually exclusive projects reach profitability.

The revenues accruing from a property letting are very often known with a high degree of certainty at the commencement of the project, by comparison with those which a multiple producer might envisage. Nevertheless, the development of probability and variation analysis techniques, as part of our working up procedures from basic data, is seen as an aid in our departure from rule-of-thumb methods.

More sophisticated tables are now available which will show the net present value of unit expenditure on plant and machinery after all taxation allowances, which reduces time-consuming mathematics. The influence of the economist upon management accounting, on balance, is not unwelcome.

Yours faithfully,

Sedgley, Dudley, Worcs. R. C. EVANS, F.C.C.S.

Growth, Historic Cost and Profit

SIR, – The authors of two letters to yourself (MAFCA, November 2nd issue, and Mr Michael Greener, November 16th issue) should consider the oddity of the statement in some annual accounts of nationalized industries that a profit was made but in order to provide for replacement and/or growth a loss actually resulted. The proposed method put forward in my article (October 19th issue), overcomes this oddity and enables a fair and true view of profit or loss to be presented.

It is inequitable that growth should be penalized by taxation in one sector and that taxation in the other sector should be the source of funds for growth rather than the consumer or user. However, such considerations could well be the subject of political debate.

Once the equity of the principle has been established, a method would be required and that published in the October 19th issue is offered for consideration. I am grateful to Mr Greener for his poetic and provocative remarks but regret that an adequate reply is beyond me. MAFCA's constructive comments are much appreciated. He should note, however, that determining the useful life of a fixed asset is a problem that also occurs with other methods.

Apologies are offered for the delay in submitting this reply which arose from unexpected delays and involvement during a recent visit to Nigeria.

Yours faithfully,

YOUR CONTRIBUTOR.

DUMFRIES AND GALLOWAY ASSOCIATION OF SCOTTISH CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

Annual Dinner

The ninth annual dinner of the Dumfries and Galloway Association of Scottish Chartered Accountants was held last month at the Station Hotel, Dumfries, with Mr J. H. Thornley, C.A., Chairman of the Association, in the chair.

Mr H. S. P. Munro, M.P., who proposed the toast of The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, stated that the present taxation system 'is not far from a fiscal concentration camp'. What he wanted to do was to reduce personal direct taxation at every level and let people keep more of their own money. 'It is far better to tax consumption rather than earnings; indeed, I believe that we should move away from a penalty on earnings to a charge on spending'. He went on to remind his audience 'that right throughout our history it is from small businesses have come the men and ideas that have made the country great, and that it is intolerable that they are now being driven up the wall by quantities of red tape and the confiscatory rates of taxation'.

Responding, Mr John A. Stewart, President of the Institute, took up the question of those who just failed to qualify as chartered accountants and said that under the integration proposals these people would in future become 'licentiates'.

The toast of the guests was proposed by Mr Alexander Mair, C.A., and replied to in humorous vein by the Provost of Dumfries, Mr Ernest Robertson. Mr J. E. Semple, C.A., proposed a vote of thanks to the chair.

INSURANCE BUSINESS

The first annual report by the Board of Trade concerning 'matters within' the Insurance Companies Acts 1958–67, as required by section 98 of the 1967 Companies Act, was published on Thursday of last week entitled Insurance Business. (HMSO 2*s* 4*d*.)

It is in two parts. The first part records the action by the Board of Trade during the earlier months of 1967 under the powers given by the Insurance Companies Act 1958 and from August to December 1967 under the extended powers conferred by Part II of the Companies Act 1967. The matters covered include authorizations to carry on insurance business, restrictions of existing businesses where solvency was in doubt and petitions by the BOT for the winding-up of insurance companies.

The remainder of the report is to be published later under the title Insurance Business: Statistics. It will contain a double set of tables relating to the accounts and statements deposited with the Board of Trade covering business transacted by insurance companies for accounting years ended between September 1st, 1964, and August 31st, 1965, and accounting years ended between September 1st, 1965, and August 31st, 1966. Subsequent issues will relate to the accounts of only one year, namely those of the year preceding that covered by the annual report.

ALPHABETICAL LIST OF INDUSTRIES

The Alphabetical List of Industries (HMSO price 12*s* 6*d*) now published, prepared by the Central Statistical Office to complement the 1968 edition of the Standard Industrial Classification, provides a detailed index of some nine thousand different company activities.

From the list, management can tell under which heading in the Standard Industrial Classification their particular product or service should be included for statistical purposes.

H. FOULKS LYNCH & CO LTD

The following statistics testify to the lead still held by Foulks Lynch in the field of correspondence tuition for the examinations of the Institute of Chartered Accountants:

In the two years ending with the September 1968 Intermediate examination, candidates presented by H. Foulks Lynch & Co Ltd obtained:

In the Intermediate Examinations

Thirty-three out of thirty-four honours, including all the first three places, and thirty-two out of thirty-four prizes;

and

In the Final Examinations

Eighty-three out of eighty-seven honours, including all the first two places, and one hundred and one out of one hundred and two prizes.

However, the practice of augmenting home study with Oral courses has grown, and Foulks Lynch (Classes) Ltd, an associate company, have extended and refurnished their classrooms to meet this growing demand. The latest addition to this service of oral tuition consists of study courses for Intermediate and Final students, of one week duration, to be taken about half-way through each stage of their examination preparation. These provide an invaluable opportunity to consolidate the subject-matter studied thus far. Full details of these and other Introductory and Revision Courses may be obtained from:

Betterment Levy Guidance

THE Land Commission's experience in 1968 of operating Part III of the Land Commission Act 1967, which relates to the collection of betterment levy, has resulted in the issue of a number of practice notes on noteworthy points, and others are to follow. Meanwhile, the beginning of another year seems an opportune time to publish and review such notes as have already appeared.

The practice notes are much concerned with leases and one note ('Agreement for Leases') draws attention to the fact that section 85 (3) (b) of the Act provides, for the purposes of betterment levy, that an enforceable agreement for a lease is as good as a lease. The agreement must, however, be such that it creates a tenancy, and it must be a complete agreement so that the Courts would be prepared to enforce it if asked to do so. The Commission apprehend that tenants under agreements for leases may not appreciate that if the agreement is entered into on or after April 6th, 1967, the agreement will need to be notified to the Commission if it creates a tenancy for a term of years certain of not less than seven years.

Where an agreement for a lease was entered into before April 6th, 1967, then, if a formal lease is entered into on or after that date, the formal lease will be of no effect for the purposes of betterment levy and no levy will be payable. Anyone who wishes to contend that a formal lease has been preceded by an enforceable agreement for the lease which was entered into before April 6th, 1967, must produce full evidence of the agreement and indicate when possession of the land was taken and the date from which rent was payable.

Section 85 (3) (b) has two other effects. It means that enforceable agreements for leases entered into in the 'antecedent period' from July 1st, 1948, to September 22nd, 1965, inclusive, can be used to provide a Schedule 5 base value even though the agreement may have been followed by a formal lease in the 'interim period' from September 23rd, 1965, to April 5th, 1967, inclusive, or not followed by a formal lease at all. But if the enforceable agreement falls within the 'interim period', then no Schedule 5 base value can arise, even though there may have been a formal lease on or after April 6th, 1967.

Another note ('Surrender of Leases by Operation of Law') deals with section 85 (3) (a) which provides that the surrender of a tenancy to a landlord, if made for valuable consideration, is to be treated as an assignment on sale of the tenancy to that landlord so as, in some circumstances, to be a chargeable act or event in Case A under section 29 (1) (c). Landlords and their advisers are reminded that section 85 (3) (a) applies to the surrender of a lease whether the surrender is effected expressly or by operation of law without any instrument or written document being used. But there is one case where a surrender of a tenancy, whether express or implied, is not treated as an assignment on sale of that tenancy. This is where the surrender is made in consideration of, or in pursuance of an agreement for, the grant of a new tenancy.

Part II of another note ('Renewals, Extensions and Variations of Tenancies') gives some examples of the surrender of a lease by operation of law, in connection with the point that grants of new leases between the same landlord and the same tenant, and renewals, extensions and variations of tenancies can fall within either Case B or Case F of the Act. In 1960 A grants B a lease for 21 years. In 1975 A grants B a new lease commencing immediately at a new or the same rent for a period ending after 1981. There is no mention of a surrender, but the new lease will effect a surrender by operation of law of the old lease and the disposition will fall within Case F. If, following the grant of the 21-year lease in 1960, A and B extend the term of the lease in 1975 by an endorsement stating that the lease is to have effect as if it were for 42 years instead of 21 years, there will again be a surrender of the old tenancy by operation of law and the grant of a new one so that Case F once more applies. But if following the 21-year lease in 1960, A in 1975 grants B a new lease at a new or the same rent for a further 21 years from 1981 on the expiration of the old lease, there will be no surrender and Case B will apply. Part I of the same note ('Surrenders of Tenancies') sets out usefully in tabular form ten types of surrender with an indication of the Case (if any) within which each falls.

It is established practice where A contracts to sell land to B, but before a conveyance has been executed B contracts – usually at an enhanced price – to sell the same land to a sub-purchaser C, for B to call upon A to convey direct to C, both for convenience and to save one lot of stamp duty. But B joins in the conveyance to give a receipt for the part of the purchase money paid to him, to acknowledge the payment to A and to transfer his equitable interest to C.

This type of transaction naturally raises a question of apportionment of levy. Since B in the case never obtains the fee simple he never becomes the grantor for the purpose of the Act. But section 36 (3) provides that where part of the consideration for the disposition is payable to someone to whom grantor A has previously agreed to sell the land, e.g., B, A and B can apply to the Commission for an apportionment of the levy between them. If the Commission agree to make a formal apportionment A and B will be liable only for the part of the levy apportioned to each of them; but if the Commission do not make a formal apportionment A and B will be jointly and severally liable for the whole of the levy.

In another note ('Conveyance of Land to Sub-purchasers and Apportionment of Levy') the commission say they do not normally intend to make a formal apportionment under section 36 (3), but to serve notices on both A and B for the whole amount of the levy so that in due course, when the assessment becomes operative, A and B will be jointly and severally liable for the whole of the levy. However, if A and B both make a request in writing, the Commission will be prepared to indicate informally how the levy would have been divided between the parties had the commission made a formal apportionment, namely, in the way in which the levy would have been split had the transfer been effected by separate conveyances from A to B and from B to C. And, says the note naïvely, the Commission will also be prepared to tell both parties when the total amount of levy has been paid regardless of who in fact has paid it, so that both parties will know that their joint and several liability is at an end. This ingenious scheme enables the Commission to collect the whole of the levy from either A or B, while leaving it to A or B to recover the amount overpaid by him from the other of them. But the Commission will make a formal apportionment where they allow one of the parties but not the other to give security and to pay his share by instalments, because it would be unreasonable for the other party to have a contingent joint and several liability hanging over him for the duration of the instalment agreement.

The same note warns purchasers and their professional advisers of a possible pitfall in connection with sub-purchases. If B, the original purchaser, is let into possession of the land on the strength of his contract with A and incurs expenditure on improvements and ancillary rights which increased the development value of the land within Part V of Schedule 4 of the Act, B (where there is sub-sale to C) will not be able to deduct such expenditure in the calculation of the net development value. This is because 'grantor' and 'chargeable owner' in this connection means the owner of the fee simple, whereas if the land is conveyed direct from A to C, B never gets the fee simple.

Section 61 of the Act confers an exemption from levy on the interest held by a person who owned land at September 23rd, 1965, and who wishes to build a dwelling-house for himself or a member of his family as defined in the Act. The practice notes make a concession here in the case of hardship.

The notes are a pretty mixed bag, but one can only ignore them at the risk of falling into a trap or missing a worth-while concession.

Transport for Industry

THE Ministry of Transport has recently published a report[1] analysing the factors which determine the use made of the various methods of transport available to manufacturing industry. In the preamble to the report the statement is made that in 1963 the census of production showed that expenditure by manufacturing industry on transport services amounted to £600 million, of which £240 million was the cost of own transport and £360 million was paid to professional transport operators and services.

The preamble goes on to say that when such vast amounts are expended on a service, it is desirable to know what transport facilities are at the disposal of industry and what use is made of them. With this view most economists and accountants would agree, especially when it is estimated that the cost of such services is probably now running at the rate of £800 million per annum. The economist may well be concerned that transport policy should produce the most efficient allocation of resources devoted to transport services. The accountant, particularly in his management functions, will need to be satisfied that particular transport users are getting the best value for money expended on such services.

The report is the summary of the findings of one main and one supplementary inquiry carried out by the use of questionnaires. The main bulk of the information was gathered in 1966 and 1967. This information concerned the transport arrangements and traffic dispatched during one year by some 720 establishments in manufacturing industry.

Most firms used more than one mode of transport and comparatively few, including those operating their own vehicles, were heavily committed to a single method. In nearly half the cases investigated, expenditure on the most preferred method was two-thirds or less of total expenditure on transport. This is a clear indication that manufacturing industry exercises a choice between the various transport services open to it. Short-haul traffic – (i.e. journeys of less than 50 miles), was dominated by own road vehicles operated by the consigning firm – 70 per cent of such consignments was sent by this method. On long hauls of over 100 miles, own road vehicles carried about 17 per cent of the consignments. In these cases road hauliers carried about 34 per cent.

Of the total number of consignments considered in the general survey, own road vehicles carried 48 per cent; road hauliers, 22 per cent; railways, 12 per cent; GPO, 16 per cent, and others 2 per cent. The report is careful to point out that at the time the survey was made the use of freightliners was in its infancy; the railways could, by now, have captured a slightly greater share of the traffic. The overall share of 12 per cent carried by rail included 28 per cent of some small sizes of consignment (over 22 lbs but less than one cwt) and about 13 per cent of large consignments over seven and a half tons. The proportions quoted as carried by the various methods of transport refer, it must be remembered, to consignments. If ton-miles were the unit, the railway share would be greater – possibly double the figure now quoted.

The survey obtained information about the costs to consignors of the methods of transport selected and the supplementary investigation collected data about the costs which would have been incurred if particular individual consignments had been dispatched by other means. A high proportion of consignments had special features, e.g. perishability, in urgent need or requiring special bodies on the vehicles. These features were common in the case of traffic carried in own vehicles.

Of the firms covered by this supplementary investigation, a proportion which varied between one-third and one-half according to the nature of the industry, knew the costs by alternative modes of transport for some or all of the specific consignments they were asked about. At a first glance, it might seem that these figures indicate that a large proportion of firms are not very transport-cost conscious. Other findings tend, however, to modify this conclusion. It seems that in the great majority of cases in which a firm used its own vehicles and did not know the cost by an alternative method, the consignment had special features.

In the supplementary investigation, well over one-quarter of the consignments sent by professional operators were forwarded by methods which were more expensive, in terms of cash outlay, than the cheapest alternative. Nearly one-third of the loads not sent by the cheapest method involved the sender in a cash outlay of more than 25 per cent higher than the cheapest alternative. These figures add emphasis to the views expressed by traders that in their general transport requirements they attached great importance to ready availability and speed of service. The effect of relative price on the method of transport selected was small. It is of interest to note that a large body of traders had, or appeared to have, made simple cost-benefit analyses. This lesson ought not to be lost on the providers of transport services.

Estate Duty Aggregation – III

LAST week we gave an example to show the relief from full aggregation under section 38 of the Finance Act 1968 where there were pre-Budget policies on the deceased's life and the whole amount payable under each policy was chargeable to duty on the death of the deceased.

Assume now that the deceased did not pay all the premiums within the vulnerable period or that the value chargeable to duty falls to be scaled down because of graduation relief under section 64 of the Finance Act 1960. Assume also that as a result, A's £30,000 policy in the example is dutiable only to the extent of £15,000 and that B's £45,000 policy is dutiable only to the extent of £35,000. Thus the total dutiable amount is reduced from £75,000 to £50,000. Nevertheless, the proportion of the dutiable amount which is relieved from full aggregation remains at only one-third.

It follows that two-thirds of A's £15,000 is fully aggregable. The remaining £5,000 is not fully aggregable but pays duty at a rate appropriate to an estate of £15,000. Similarly two-thirds of B's £35,000 is fully aggregable and the remaining one-third of the £35,000 pays duty at a rate appropriate to £35,000.

Subsection (9) of section 38 deals with policies on the deceased's life which were taken out before March 20th, 1968, and therefore fall within the relieving provisions of subsection (7), but matured or were surrendered before March 20th, 1968. For these there is no £25,000 limit and therefore they escape the new aggregation rules. Moreover, where there are also policies within subsection (7) which did not mature or become surrendered before March 20th, 1968, the values of the matured or surrendered policies is not to be brought into the £25,000 calculation under subsection (8).

The section does not define 'matured' or 'surrendered'. However, it would seem that unless the policy has come to an end before March 20th, 1968, it will not enjoy the benefit of subsection (9). Some endowment policies, as indicated last week, may provide for interim payments before final maturity. It may be possible for the interim payments greatly to exceed the final payment; nevertheless, the policy will not have matured before the final payment falls due. If, by March 20th, 1968, all but a very small proportion of the total benefits under the policy have already been paid, it seems that the whole value of the policy will have to be brought in without any relief under subsection (9). Those donees who wished to raise money on the policy before March 20th, 1968, and were persuaded to borrow on the security of the policy rather than to surrender the policy, will find that this course has increased the estate duty payable on the donor's death.

Given a policy which falls within subsection (7) and which is therefore potentially entitled to relief under that subsection, there might be some temptation to enter into an arrangement under which the terms of the policy are varied in such manner as to increase the value of that policy – possibly on terms of the value of some other policy issued by the company (and not qualifying for relief) being reduced correspondingly. The donor might even pay additional money to the insurance company in order to swell the value of the policy, rather than making a new and separate gift to the donee of the policy. The draftsman has thought of this one; hence subsection (10) which provides as follows:

> '(10) If the terms of a policy are varied after March 19th, 1968, in such a way that the value of the policy is greater than it would have been if no variation had been made:
> (a) the relief given by subsection (7) above shall apply to such part of any gift as can justly be attributed to the value the policy would have had if not varied;
> (b) the policy shall be brought into subsection (8) above at that value and the fraction in that subsection shall be applied to the said part of the gift.'

When the Finance Act 1956 introduced income tax and surtax relief for premiums paid for retirement annuities by the self-employed, section 35 of that Act provided, in favour of annuities under contracts approved for relief purposes by the Inland Revenue, that the property passing should be treated for estate duty purposes as a 'life insurance' within section 33 (2) of the Finance Act 1954. This subsection was referred to in the first article in this series. Section 35 went on to say that the property was to be so treated 'whether or not the deceased at any time had an interest therein'.

Section 38 of the 1968 Act makes no reference to section 35 of the Finance Act 1956 and consequently the interaction of the two sections is somewhat vague. However, it is believed that the Revenue will not apply the new section 38 to such property. The same applies to benefits under superannuation funds which are approved under section 379 of the Income Tax Act 1952 or, presumably, under section 388 of that Act.

Institute's New Council Member

MR R. F. GRIFFITHS, F.C.A., a partner in the firm of Clement Keys & Son, Chartered Accountants, of Birmingham, was elected a member of the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales at a meeting of the Council on Wednesday of last week (reported elsewhere in this issue).

Educated at King Edwards School, Birmingham, to which he won a Foundation Scholarship, Mr Griffiths was subsequently articled in 1949 to Mr C. E. Garratt, M.C., T.D., F.C.A., of Carter & Co, of Birmingham, and was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1954.

Following National Service, when he was commissioned into the Royal Regiment of Artillery, he rejoined Carter & Co in May 1956 where he remained until April 1962, when he entered into partnership with his present firm.

Mr Griffiths has been an active member of The Birmingham and West Midlands Society of Chartered Accountants since 1963, during which time he has served as dinner secretary, treasurer, and assistant secretary. He has also been a member of the Society's Regional Technical Advisory Committee since 1963.

A keen rugby football, lawn tennis and squash player, Mr Griffiths played rugby with the Old Edwardians' Football Club from 1949 to 1959 and was the secretary from 1965 to 1968 of the Old Edwardians' Sports Club and has been its chairman since 1968. A member of the Edgbaston Priory Club, he served for a period on the general committee and also as chairman of the lawn tennis subcommittee of the former Edgbaston Lawn Tennis Club. Mr Griffiths includes among his other pastimes, angling and music. He is married with one daughter and one son.

Resignations from the Council

THE resignations of Sir William Carrington, F.C.A., and Mr C. J. M. Bennett, B.A., F.C.A., from the Council of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales were received with regret at a meeting of the Council held on Wednesday of last week (reported on other pages of this issue).

Sir William, who is senior partner in Whinney Murray & Co, of London, was a member of the Council for 26 years and was President of the Institute in 1955–56. He has taken a notable part in the affairs of the Institute and as a member of the Council served as chairman or as a member of numerous committees.

A member of the executive committee of The Chartered Accountants' Benevolent Association for 24 years, he was President of the Association for 11 years until his retirement in June 1968.

Sir William has also served on a number of Government commissions and committees, including those on the Taxation Treatment of Provision for Retirement, the Millard Tucker Committees on Taxation of Trading Profits, and the Royal Commission on Taxation. He was knighted in the 1958 Birthday Honours List.

In his letter of resignation to the President, Sir William said:

> 'I have been a member for a very long time, and I am quite convinced that I should make room for someone who is younger and more closely in touch with the rising generation. I have enjoyed my period of office, during which I have made very many friends with whom I hope still to keep in touch.
> 'The Presidency of the Institute has never been a sinecure, but a particularly heavy burden rests on you and your immediate successors and you have my very best wishes for the tasks which are now before you and those which lie ahead – in particular, integration. I am firmly convinced that this is an absolute necessity if the accountancy profession and our Institute are to maintain and enhance their position and influence in the business life of this country, indeed, of the whole world as we know it.'

Mr Bennett, who is a partner in Barton, Mayhew & Co, of London, was elected to the Council in 1963 and has been a member of several committees including the General Purposes and Finance, Technical, and Overseas Relations.

He has served on three Government commissions of inquiry: two relating to the sugar industry in Fiji and Mauritius, and the other on electricity supply companies in Hong Kong. In 1967 he was appointed a member of the committee set up jointly by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Minister of Technology to inquire into certain Government contracts with Bristol Siddeley Engines Ltd.

Mr Bennett, in his letter of resignation to the President of the Institute, said:

> 'Reluctantly I feel that rather than attempt during 1969 to catch up what I have missed during 1968 it would be wiser and better that I should give some younger man an earlier opportunity than he might otherwise have had of learning the ropes of Council business and of making an intellectual contribution to the profession on a more up to date basis than I am able. I am also aware that much more than mere attendance at committee meetings is expected of Council members and it has seemed to me almost certain that my younger successor will be much more willing and able to contribute far more widely than I am in this respect.'

More New Year Honours

IN last week's issue we gave the names of members of the profession who appeared in the New Year Honours List.

We have since learned that the C.B.E. has been awarded to Mr P. G. James, B.COM., F.C.A., a member of the British Railways Board, and that the M.B.E. has been awarded to Mr W. R. Matthews, F.C.A., F.H.A., Treasurer, Newport and East Monmouthshire Hospital Management Committee, and to Mr L. E. Taylor, F.I.M.T.A., Borough Treasurer, Shrewsbury.

Close Companies: Small Shortfall Concession

FOLLOWING recent discussions with the Board of Inland Revenue, the Accountants Joint Parliamentary Committee has been advised of a concession regarding small shortfalls. The Board has informed the allied accountancy bodies that as a matter of administrative practice, where a close company is a trading company, a member of a trading group or a property investment company, no shortfall assessment will be made for an accounting period in which the shortfall in distribution is not more than £100 (proportionately reduced for an accounting period of less than twelve months). For this purpose a company will be regarded as a property investment company if its activities consist wholly or mainly of holding property, the income from which ranks as estate or trading income under the close company provisions.

This relaxation extends to existing shortfall assessments which have not become final and conclusive. It does not apply to shortfalls calculated under the special rules dealing with cessation of trade or business and liquidation. Inspectors of Taxes have been advised.

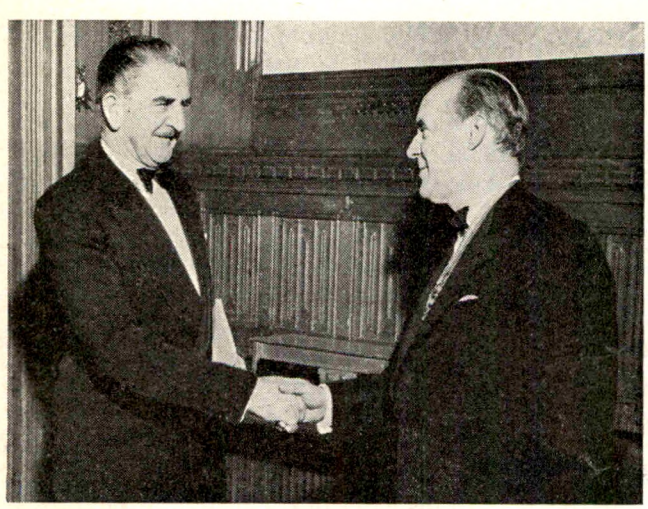
Business Game for Sixth-formers

OVER 1,000 sixth-formers in 81 schools will be taking part in the second business game for sixth-formers organized by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, with the co-operation of International Computers Limited, which starts next Monday. The game involves teams of sixth-formers as rival boards of directors, matching their wits in business decisions.

This management exercise for schools is the second in an annual series played for the Institute's Silver Challenge Shield. In 1968, 27 schools played and the winner was Downside, the present holders of the shield. The original 27 schools are all participating again.

The game has aroused international interest. Countries as far afield as Ceylon, Australia and Canada have requested details, and the South African National Council of Chartered Accountants are organizing a game of their own in 1969. A film featuring the first series is now available from the Institute.

The 81 schools taking part in the 1969 series are divided into groups of three, representing three



The President's Dinner of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants was held in the Members' Room of the House of Commons on Wednesday of last week, with the President, Mr Robert Glendinning, M.A., C.A., F.C.W.A., in the chair. Lord Aylestone, C.B.E., Chairman of the Independent Television Authority, being received by Mr Glendinning, and, right, some of the principal guests at the dinner – left to right: the Rt Hon. They conduct their own meetings, with the managing director leading the discussions of the finance, production, marketing and works directors.

Budget Advice

IN its annual Budget representations to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Income Tax Payers' Society suggests a top combined rate of income tax and surtax of 15*s* as against the current 18*s* 3*d* in the £. It points out the continued fall in the value of money and asks for a raising of the current income limits for age relief, and of the minimum income at which surtax is imposed. In the same vein the Society asks for a raising of the maximum amounts allowed to close companies in respect of remuneration to full-time directors.

Like many another, the Society urges that there should be exemption from capital gains tax where the proceeds of disposal do not exceed £1,000 in one year. Last year's exemption of gains up to £50 is quoted as being 'much too low in view of the disproportionate administrative and professional costs involved in dealing with small transactions'. The Society also suggests that the rate of capital gains tax be reduced as the period of holding the assets lengthens.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Relic of the Past

by An Industrious Accountant

I SAW an old-fashioned roll-top desk in an auctioneer's showroom the other day. It was made of worn and faded oak whose ancient varnish still retained traces of the years of polish that had been lavished on it, and it had the dignity of the craftsmen's era. I was sorely tempted to buy it there and then for old time's sake.

My father used to sit at just such a desk in his shop in the little country town where I was born. A long counter ran down each side of the shop; he himself worked in a tiny room with maroon-coloured woodwork and a window in the left-hand corner, looking down the centre aisle of the shop. On his left he could see into the main street of the town; to the front he could scan the shop; through the little glass door on his right he could step out to greet suppliers and customers. A similar arrangement is still to be seen in many a village store today.

Four drawers with sturdy wooden handles were on either side of the desk's knee hole, each section topped by a pull-out ledge for additional working space. Inside the roll-top, fronting the sitter, were numerous drawers and pigeon-holes, with oblong 'tills' to hold pins, paper-clips, etc. There were round sunken inserts for blue and red ink-bottles and a series of parallel grooves for pens and pencils. The flat top was piled with invoices and receipts, the drawers full of bundles tied with coloured tape – the whole a focus of tireless, dedicated industry, where he sat boy and man for forty-eight years.

'Good old has-been, if you like junk', said the young auctioneer superciliously. I wasn't listening. I'd had my first lesson in book-keeping as a ten-year-old at a desk like that; I knew every crevice in it, even the carved column which pulled out to reveal a secret drawer. I'd been slapped, too, more than once for jamming the roll-top by clumsy pulling.

Our desk had belonged to my grandfather a century ago. He'd been appointed clerk of the union in the town in 1863. It was a post comprising all the varied responsibilities, and more besides, that most chief accountants and secretaries perform today. Indeed, the range of highly-specialized duties performed by the relatively unsophisticated clerk/book-keepers of those forgotten decades, unhelped by professional journals or books on management theories, was astonishing.

The yellowing back files of the local weekly newspaper give verbatim reports of the numerous meetings attended by the clerk and his handling of the problems of the union's hundreds of inmates – destitute, old, or vagrant. There were supplies of food and drink and bedding, quotations for building maintenance and repairs, arguments over sewage or salaries. There were human problems of staff and cliques and illness. There was the board of guardians, diligent, overbearing, or pernickety (boards don't change!) or delinquent ratepayers or cranky litigation-loving locals of every class and category.

There was also the remorseless glare of publicity. His predecessor had been sacked for embezzling the funds. In contrast the old newspapers record the local government auditors' tributes to his own punctilious accuracy for twenty years. He must often have worked late at his minutes and correspondence, bending over the desk into the small hours. The work was endless, the pressure exhausting, the starting salary £100 per annum.

The desk's rugged solidity was somehow attractive as a souvenir. . . . 'You can have it cheap', said the auctioneer. 'We get lots of them, relics of the good old easy-going days when they didn't know what work was.'

Trends in Trusts

by H. S. A. MACNAIR, F.C.A.

ALTHOUGH trusts are familiar enough in outline, difficulties begin to appear on closer inspection. Classification by genus and species presents problems mainly by reason of the original character of each trust, despite the widespread use of precedents, so that lawyers – no less than Linneans – may fail to agree as to the grading appropriate in particular instances.

For the purpose of capital gains tax, use is made of the expression 'settled property' which is defined, unless the context otherwise requires, as meaning any property held in trust other than property to which section 22 (5) of the Finance Act 1965 applies (as to which some guidance has been provided by Tomlinson v. Glyns Executor & Trustee Co and Knox (The Accountant, December 14th, 1968).

This case decided that the extension of the terms of that subsection to include not only nominees but also 'bare' trustees stopped with those trustees whose trusteeship could effectively be terminated by a person absolutely entitled to the trust property. Practically, this could be done by giving a good receipt for it or valid directions as to its disposal. Instances of disability appear from the Law of Property Act 1925 which prevents a legal estate being held by an infant (section 1 (6)). Where a legal estate in land is vested in a lunatic or defective any requisite dispositions are to be effected by his committee or receiver acting under statutory powers or a Court order (section 22 (1)). Again, clause 7 of Table A to the Companies Act 1948 acknowledges the absolute right of the registered holder of a share but some articles may exclude infants in which event a trustee for his share would apparently need to remain in office until majority.

'Held in Trust'

The question is at once raised as to what is meant by the expression 'held in trust'? A search for the answer can be daunting. Thus for the purposes of the Trustee Act 1925, the meaning assigned by section 68 (17) commences with the negative assertion that 'trust' does not include the duties incident to an estate by way of mortgage. No definition in terms is offered although with the foregoing exception the expressions 'trust' and 'trustee' are said to extend to implied and constructive trusts and to cases where the trustee has a beneficial interest in the trust property.

There is a further statutory extension to the office of a personal representative. As to this last, it is observed by P. H. Pettit that it is not now possible to draw a clear line between trustees and personal representatives (Equity and the Law of Trusts, chapter 2).

Varying definitions of a trust have been canvassed by eminent writers, although it is usually found necessary to amplify the favoured text to take in the more recondite variations. Facetiously it is sometimes said that the first requirement of a valid will is that there should be some property to dispose of, and one may regard the existence of some subject matter as essential to the practical functioning of a trust. That the trustee is the man responsible for doing something about that property there is no doubt and there is a wide class of persons from which vacancies in that office may be filled.

On the other hand, the identification of those entitled to rank as beneficiaries (cestuis que trust) often presents grave difficulties. Undoubtedly the linchpin of the trust mechanism is the Court of law which interprets the settlor's wishes, limits their extravagances, counsels the doubtful trustee and restrains or replaces the delinquent. The Court may give fresh direction to a cause which has exhausted its original impetus or may decree restitution to its progenitors, as in re Gillingham Bus Disaster Fund ([1967] 3 W.L.R. 1069). In this article only the law of England is considered, although this has many parallels in the Anglo-Saxon Diaspora.

Pension arrangements

It may be informative to examine trusts specially significant in relation to pension arrangements. A wide range of persons have interests in pension schemes, many of which are designed to achieve recognition under section 379 of the Income Tax Act 1952. An essential condition of approval for such a 'superannuation fund' is that it should be bona fide established under irrevocable trusts in connection with some trade or undertaking carried on in the United Kingdom by a person residing therein.

At this point it may be asked how 'irrevocable trusts' may be reconciled with the rule against perpetuities, despite the less stringent terms of the Perpetuities and Accumulations Act 1964 so far as concerns deeds effective after July 15th, 1964. The difficulty is overcome by the Superannuation and other Trust Funds (Validation) Act 1927 so far as concerns the trusts of any funds in Great Britain registered under that Act with the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies. For those who wish neither to register nor to include the limiting clause otherwise requisite, it is interesting to note the opinion vouchsafed by J. K. Mitchell that this may be dispensed with where, on the death of a member under an assured scheme, the benefits can be paid only to his dependants or representatives and no part of the benefits can remain unsettled for an indefinite period after his death (Pension Schemes, chapter xx).

In these times it is perhaps only of academic interest that the 1927 Act also validates trust funds for the reduction of the National Debt, in which connection exemption from income tax is granted by section 459 of the Income Tax Act 1952 and from capital gains tax by section 35 (5) of the Finance Act 1965.

Top-hat pension schemes

Chapter II of Part 18 in the Income Tax Act 1952 is concerned primarily with the imposition of a charge to tax on directors and employees measured by the actual or notional cost of retirement or other benefits calculated to enure to them under a scheme, often individual in character, devised for their benefit. The background to this legislation is discussed in the report of the Committee on Taxation Treatment of Provision for Retirement (Cmd 9063, page 25 onwards). Exemption from this charge is granted by section 387 (2) (b) to schemes approved under section 388 by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue and in this connection many of the detailed factors relevant to approval are spelled out in the report.

Thus section 388 (1) (c) requires the amount commutable to be restricted by comparison with statutory superannuation schemes for which purpose an annuity or pension of not more than £39 a year would normally be accepted as trivial. This limit, together with other factors, is under consideration in connection with the general review of the tax rules affecting superannuation schemes to which reference was recently made by the Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Hansard, November 19th, 1968).

Position on premature decease

An illustration of a typical arrangement under section 388, for which Revenue approval was forthcoming, occurs in Darwen v. Leek & Others (47 ATC 28). A director accepted a salary reduction of £1,000 a year and at the same time a premium in that amount became payable by his employer on an endowment policy designed to yield a pension of some £1,880 on survival to 65 or, on prior death, a lump sum equal to ten years' pension. In the latter event the proceeds were to be held by the company upon trust for the benefit of such one or more of the specified descriptions of persons as the company in its absolute discretion should decide or failing them upon trust for further descriptions of persons.

This style of language represents an essay in estate duty avoidance (which in the Leek case was exigible at 45 per cent) and the general background to this subject may be explored in Dymonds Death Duties 14th edition, page 433) from which it will be seen that estate duty is not claimed in relation to the dropping of a life of a beneficiary where there are more than two possible discretionary objects.

However, the avoidance of duty in such circumstances pre-supposes the validity of the intended trust which in Leek failed to get off the ground. To understand why requires some study of case law on trusts. At the outset it may be observed that the perpetuity obstacle mentioned above – which represented the initial ground of failure when the Leek trusts were considered in the High Court – was dismissed in the Court of Appeal. There the judges were agreed that the company would have had to exercise its discretion once and for all so that the possibility of an indefinite series of decisions tending to perpetuity did not arise. Furthermore that single decision required to be taken within a reasonable time, which Harman, L.J., quantified as 'far less than 21 years'.

Powers collateral and trust powers

As to the main cause of failure of the parties' intentions, it is necessary to go back to the root distinction between a trust and a power. It has been said that the essence of a trust is the intention to impose an obligation: that of a power to confer a discretion (see A Casebook on Trusts by Nathan & Marshall). To identify which is present is fundamentally a question of construing the trust deed, and in The Modern Law of Trusts (Parker & Mellows) emphasis is laid on the distinction – often a narrow one – between a trust and a power of appointment. The latter is sometimes designated a power collateral.

In delivering his judgment in the Leek case, Harman, L.J., adverted to his earlier decision in re Gestetner's Settlement (32 ATC 102) where a class of discretionary objects included former employees of Gestetners Ltd (and any company for the time being associated through a common director), their spouses, widows or widowers. It will readily be appreciated that to identify a given individual as ranking for inclusion in that class was relatively simple but to identify the whole range of individuals capable of being included at any particular time was impracticable.

It might be arguable that a power of selection in favour of such a class cannot honestly be exercised if the person required to do so is not in a position to weigh the merits of each and every potential beneficiary – an impossible task in such circumstances. 'Let observation with extensive view, survey mankind, from China to Peru' wrote Dr Johnson, but the necessity for such a survey as the prerequisite of the exercise of a power collateral was negatived by Harman, J. (as he then was) in the Gestetner case.

Trustees' higher standard of conduct

Hence a power of appointment (not a trust power) granted to one or other of a chain of beneficiaries is properly apt to cover such a situation as that where a man is given power to appoint to grandchildren but one of his sons has disappeared without trace, so that he may validly exercise his power of appointment in favour of those grandchildren whose existence is known to him. It seems that the ultimate justification for this view rests on the supposition that the settlor trusted his trustees to exercise their collective judgement in much the same way that he himself as an individual would have been able to do.

Once again it might be argued that if such a degree of confidence is acceptable in the exercise of a power collateral, why should not the trustees be regarded as competent to divide income or capital among such a class where the existence of a trust makes it imperative to do so? The answer was supplied by the Court of Appeal in CIR v. Broadway Cottages Trust (33 ATC 305; 35 TC 577) by reference to the principle stated in the classic case of Morice v. Bishop of Durham. This invalidates a trust of which the execution cannot be controlled by the Court acting, if necessary, in lieu of trustees.

Where the class to be benefited is clearly defined, and administration is merely impeded by the inertia or recalcitrance of trustees who default in the exercise of the discretion entrusted to them, it is thought that the Court could surmount the difficulty by ordering an equal distribution, guided by the principle that there is equity in equality. Such a distribution is, however, dependent upon the use of a formula in which the denominator is the number of those entitled to benefit. It will be seen, therefore, that uncertainty as to the beneficiary objects, viewed from the standpoint of a Court faced with the ultimate responsibility for administering the trust, is an insuperable barrier to an acceptance of a trust as valid, notwithstanding the fact that the share due to an ascertained but absent beneficiary can always be dealt with by a payment into Court.

Person having a moral claim

The first of the specified descriptions in the Leek case referred to above was set out in the letter of trust addressed to the director in these terms: 'your wife, children or other issue or such other persons as the company may consider to have a moral claim upon you'. It is worth noting that the latter phrasing, in itself, is not too uncertain to prevent identification of a particular individual. To say whether A has a moral claim on B may be a question too vague to answer but where the trustees are made arbiters of it, their opinion is factually ascertainable. Nevertheless the Court of Appeal thought that the trustees were not in a position to ascertain the whole class of such persons with sufficient certainty.

It remained for the Court to decide whether this phraseology in the Leek trust document imported a mere power or an imperative duty. However, the category of persons capable of being considered to have a moral claim was thought to be sufficiently elastic to warrant attaching an imperative sense to the words 'shall decide' which conferred the discretion on the company and in consequence the secondary dispositions failing any such decision became irrelevant. The inadvisability of referring to 'moral claims' had been noted by Pettit (supra).

Three judges heard the Leek appeal but Sachs, L.J, was not happy at concurring in a conclusion clearly adverse to the wishes of the parties, in particular the widow whose inheritance was depleted by estate duty accruing on the resultant trust for the deceased. The learned judge looked forward to the day when in such circumstances the Courts would regard themselves as entitled to have recourse to the expedient adopted in commercial cases of salvaging a contract by blue-pencilling offending words. He declared himself heartened in this approach by the terms in which Lord Denning, M.R., and Winn, L.J., expressed themselves in re Gulbenkian's Settlement heard contemporaneously.

Prospective change in the law?

The latter case was taken to the House of Lords (Wishaw and Another v. Stephens and Others ([1968] 3 WLR 1127)) who have now upheld the approval accorded by Lord Denning and his fellow judges in the Court of Appeal to a trust (in re Gulbenkian) of which the uncertain interpretation had presented difficulties. It is notable that Lord Reid specifically endorsed the doubts of Sachs, L.J., in the Leek case, and expressed grave doubts as to some of the arguments supporting the decision in Broadway Cottages Trust (supra), concluding with the comment 'I trust there may be an early opportunity for reconsideration of some of the narrow and technical decisions which have grown up in this chapter of the law'.

Lord Upjohn delivered the majority judgment in which he examined the competence of a power collateral in the context of uncertain classes of beneficiaries such as have been discussed above. In particular he distinguished the exercise of a power collateral by trustees, the quality of whose actions must at all times conform to the high standards implicit in administration answerable to the Court, as compared with the exercise by an individual at large. This reasoning precluded adherence to the doctrine propounded by Lord Denning, M.R., and Winn, L.J., that identification of at least one individual within an uncertain class could be sufficient to validate a power collateral.

Clause to defeat creditors

The clause under review in Gulbenkian's case concerned powers to appoint to that name and 'any wife and his children or remoter issue for the time being in existence whether minors or adults and any person or persons in whose house or apartments or in whose company or under whose care and control or by or with whom (that name) may from time to time be employed or residing' with others. A very similar clause was held void for uncertainty by Harman, J., in re Gresham's Settlements [1956] 1 WLR 573).

What then is the place of the Gulbenkian case in legal perspective? Perhaps it lies less in the fiery obiter dicta noted above than in the fact that the decision in re Gresham's Settlement has been over-ruled. This would seem to widen the possibilities for a very flexible type of instrument at the very moment when draftsmen are casting around for means to escape the forthcoming strait-jacket of aggregation of infants' income with that of their parents, for tax purposes.

But is it Ethical?

8. Legal Decisions Considered

CONTRIBUTED

This series of articles is based on the author's understanding of the usages of the profession as a whole and does not relate exclusively to any particular professional body. The opinions expressed are those of the author, and would not necessarily be endorsed by the governing bodies of the profession in a particular case.

PREVIOUS articles in this series have dealt with specific aspects of professional ethics and suggested that certain courses of conduct might render an accountant liable to disciplinary action. As a postscript, it may be helpful to consider the foundation and extent of the powers of a professional society to lay down and to enforce rules of conduct upon its members.

A large number of societies – including all the recognized bodies of accountants – are incorporated either by Royal Charter or under the provisions of the 1948 or earlier Companies Acts. As corporations, they have a general power to make regulations or by-laws for the proper conduct of their affairs, relative to the purposes for which they are incorporated.[1] The formal application for membership normally includes or implies an undertaking by the applicant to be bound by the by-laws for the time being in force and a member of a corporation cannot plead ignorance of its by-laws,[2] or contest the enforcement of a by-law which was in existence at the date of his admission.[3] A by-law which has been called in question may be explained or supported by reference to other by-laws.[4]

As will be seen later, the by-laws of a corporation – including a professional society – are not immune from scrutiny by the Courts and a by-law will not be upheld if it is unreasonable, or is repugnant in any way either to the general law of the land or to the corporation's own enabling instrument.

Jurisdiction of the Courts

The general attitude of the Courts towards the by-laws of a professional society was expressed by Lord Wilberforce in Pharmaceutical Society of Great Britain and Another v. Dickson ([1968] 2 All E.R. 686) at page 705:

> 'I have no doubt that this charter [of the Pharmaceutical Society], as other similar grants of corporate status and privileges to members of a profession, ought to be so construed as to give to the members a wide degree of autonomy. Particularly is this so in relation to standards of professional conduct. When, as to this matter, rules are laid down, and submitted by proper procedure to democratic approval, and approved by a majority, the Court will normally allow them to take effect. It will not permit the minority to renew a contest which it has lost in the domestic forum; but, as in the case of other law-making bodies, there are legal boundaries which must not be passed, and the Court has power to see that any exercise of the law-making or rule-making power falls fairly within the area of permitted activity.'

In the same case, his lordship had previously observed of the language of a by-law (page 704) that –

> 'Equally unmaintainable, in my judgment, is the argument that no invalidating declaration can be made [by the Court] because the rule is merely hortatory and has no binding effect. It is true that the obligation is shrouded in the word "should" instead of the word "may" but, as so often happens in the field of restrictive action, this masks the reality. That is that the new rule, if allowed to be valid, will be inserted in the code of ethics of the society, and that breaches of it may be (and by admission in the pleadings are intended to be) the subject of enforcement proceedings taken by the Council.'

It is quite clear from this passage that a by-law will not escape scrutiny by reason only of being couched in the language of recommendation, rather than of legislation, if it is in fact intended to be acted upon according to its terms. Amongst examples of by-laws which have been declared bad by the Courts are:

(a) A tax or levy on members for general or indefinite purposes, without any necessity for it.[4]

(b) A purported perpetual disqualification from office of any person who had ever been declared insolvent or bankrupt.[5]

(c) For the performance of activities not necessary or calculated to further the interests of the corporation at large.[6]

(d) A purported power to trustees of a charitable foundation to charge for services rendered in their professional capacity, causing conflict between their fiduciary obligations and their private interest.[7]

Where a by-law is of long standing, this may be evidence that it is not intrinsically inconvenient.[8]

Incorporated by Charter

When the enabling instrument is (as in the case of several accountancy bodies) a Royal Charter, the corporation and its members are not entitled to any powers or privileges which the Crown has not conferred in clear and unambiguous terms. A negative cannot be implied from a positive clause in such a charter[9] unless no other construction is possible, nor are by-laws admissible to explain a charter, although they may lessen or enforce the powers of the corporation.[10]

Unless its enabling instrument expressly provides otherwise, a corporation may admit as members such persons as it pleases,[11] but it cannot arbitrarily 'disenfranchise or expel them and any purported power to that effect will be bad. An accused member is entitled to reasonable notice of the complaint against him, and to be heard on it;[12] and if he has been expelled for insufficient cause, the Court may order his restoration.[13]

There is no exhaustive list of actions constituting 'sufficient cause' for expulsion and so far as concerns professional societies (as distinct from corporations generally) there are relatively few reported instances of disciplinary proceedings being challenged in the Courts. Expulsion should in principle be founded upon some act prejudicial to the good of the corporation, or in breach of his undertaking when admitted as a member.[14] If this is satisfied, it appears that the act relied on may be either an offence against his duty as a member; or of a nature 'heinous and atrocious' against his general duty as a subject, though not particularly relating to his duty as a member; or a combination of both.[15]

Powers of domestic tribunals

Many of the cases on the powers of corporations generally are of considerable antiquity. A modern precedent more closely akin to the position of professional societies is Lee v. Showmen's Guild of Great Britain ([1952] 1 All E.R. 1175). Following a dispute over the occupation of a certain pitch on a fairground, the defendant guild imposed a fine on the plaintiff for alleged 'unfair trading' and, when this was not paid, sought to exclude him from membership. The Court of Appeal held that his exclusion was bad and Denning, L.J. (as he then was) took the opportunity to define the powers of domestic tribunals in the following terms (page 1180):

> 'The jurisdiction of a domestic tribunal . . . must be founded on a contract express or implied. Outside the regular Courts of this country, no set of men can sit in judgment on their fellows except so far as Parliament authorizes it or the parties agree to it. . . .
> 'Although the jurisdiction of a domestic tribunal is founded on contract, express or implied, nevertheless the parties are not free to make any contract they like. There are important limitations imposed by public policy. The tribunal must for instance observe the principles of natural justice. They must give the man notice of the charge and a reasonable opportunity of meeting it. Any stipulation to the contrary would be invalid. They cannot stipulate for a power to condemn a man unheard. . . . They can indeed make the tribunal the final arbiter on questions of fact, but they cannot make it the final arbiter on questions of law. They cannot prevent its decisions being examined by the Courts. If the parties should seek by agreement to take the law out of the hands of the Courts and into the hands of a private tribunal, without any recourse at all to the Courts in case of error of law, then the agreement is to that extent contrary to public policy and void.
> 'The question in the present case is: to what extent will the Courts examine the decisions of domestic tribunals on points of law? This is a new question which is not to be solved by turning to the club cases. In the case of social clubs, the rules usually empower the committee to expel a member who in their opinion has been guilty of conduct detrimental to the club, and this is a matter of opinion and nothing else. The Courts have no wish to sit on appeal from their decisions on such a matter any more than from the decisions of a family conference. . . . It is very different with domestic tribunals which sit in judgment on the members of a trade or profession. They wield powers as great, if not greater, than any exercised by the Courts of law. They can deprive a man of his livelihood. They can ban him from the trade in which he has spent his life and which is the only trade he knows. They are usually empowered to do this for any breach of their rules, which, be it noted, are rules which they impose and which he has no real opportunity of accepting or rejecting. In theory their powers are based on contract. The man is supposed to have contracted to give them these great powers, but in practice he has no choice in the matter. . . . A man's right to work is just as important, if not more important, to him than his rights of property. These Courts intervene every day to protect rights of property. They must also intervene to protect the right to work.'

A similar decision was reached in Hughes v. Architects' Registration Council ([1957] 2 All E.R. 436). The plaintiff had practised continuously for many years as an architect and estate agent. Subsequent to his admission to the register of architects, the Council approved a regulation that (subject to certain transitional provisions in respect of members already so engaged) no architect should simultaneously practise also as an estate agent. The plaintiff continued to

a simple solution to a perennial problem

Clients may often ask you whether it is still possible to make really advantageous provision for school fees.

The answer is yes. Under our special Trustee Scheme, capital sum payments in advance continue to attract substantial benefits.

* The capital earns an attractive rate of interest, which is free of income tax, surtax and capital gains tax.
* The termly payments are not aggregated with the parent's income for tax purposes.
* The capital sum can be freed from estate duty liability instantly.

As an example of what can be achieved, a capital sum of £1890 will produce fees of £600 a year for 5 years, starting in 10 years time.

Butterworths Tax Handbook 1968-69

Covering Income Tax, Corporation Tax and Capital Gains Tax
Edited by David Roberts, of Butterworths Editorial Staff

The famous 'Yellow Book' sets out verbatim the whole of the relevant Acts as amended and as operative during 1968–69. This year, the Tax Handbook includes the Capital Allowances Act 1968. 'One wonders rather how any practitioner can possibly do without this unabridged version of all current taxation legislation enshrined in a format so unobtrusive and so readily portable in a briefcase', wrote a reviewer of last year's edition in Taxes.

What to do with a Family Company Now

By A. M. Jepson, LL.B., A.T.I.I., Solicitor

This book sets out in a readable manner the courses and alternatives open to those running, owning or advising a family trading company which is called a 'close company'. There are many close limited companies considering whether they should reconstruct as a result of recent disclosure requirements. These should find JEPSON a valuable source of guidance.

Green's Death Duties

Sixth Edition – Now brought up to date with 1968 Supplement.
By E. J. Mann, LL.B.(Lond.), of the Estate Duty Office. Assisted by J. E. Redman, LL.B.(Lond.), of the Estate Duty Office.

Green's Death Duties is one of Butterworths Modern Textbook series and as such is kept up to date with cumulative supplements from time to time. The new Supplement discusses the important changes in Estate Duty law brought about by the Finance Act 1968, and also sets out the decided cases since the 1967 Supplement was published.
The Accountant said of this edition: 'An essential part of any serious textbook on estate duty is a full reproduction of the statutes in force; it would be quite impracticable to take the legislation from statutes published in the ordinary form – Green has always been notable for the clarity with which this task has been achieved . . .'.

practise in both capacities after expiry of the transitional period, and on a formal complaint being made against him he was suspended from the register for two years, with the proviso that he should not be readmitted without having passed a qualifying examination – a decision surprising enough in itself, as he was then over 60 years of age and had practised for 30 years without any complaint against his professional competence. The practical effect would have been to disqualify him for life. He successfully contended that conduct which was permissible, and within the Council's knowledge, at the date of his admission to the register did not become professionally discreditable solely by the lapse of time and that the Council had no power to exclude him for persisting in such conduct. Devlin, J. (as he then was) observed, at page 443:

> 'There is something more important than the standing of a profession, about which the [Architects' Registration] Council is naturally and properly concerned. There is the right of every man to earn his living in whatever way he chooses unless by the law or by his own voluntary submission his way is taken from him; and in the exercise of that right he must not be punished by a professional majority under the pretext . . . that nonconformity is of itself disgraceful.'

Restraint of trade

It is well known that activities in restraint of trade are not favoured by the Courts but recent authority indicates that trade practices are not necessarily appropriate to a profession and that certain restraints are reasonable in relation to the obligations of professional membership towards other members of that profession and the public at large. Devlin, J., considered this in Hughes v. Architects' Registration Council (supra) as follows:

> 'Every profession has practices which it bars. Amongst the commonest of these are advertising, poaching and undercutting. These activities which are considered in the business world to be laudable examples of enterprise – so much so that their restraint is prima facie contrary to public policy – have always been considered offensive professionally. If a man joins a profession in which the use of trade weapons is barred and then proceeds to employ them, he is taking an unfair advantage over his fellows. They restrain themselves, believing rightly or wrongly that such restraint is essential to the good health of the profession as a whole; he gets the benefit of their restraint, and fills his purse at their expense. He is defaulting on the obligation, by which expressly or impliedly he undertook to be bound, when they made him of their company. Such conduct could be thought disgraceful not merely by those of the profession, but by outsiders who were not themselves bound by the same standards.'

Similar opinions were expressed by the House of Lords in the Pharmaceutical Society case, supra. Lord Reid observed, at page 690:

> 'The respondent argues that, as this motion would operate in restraint of trade, the ordinary principles of restraint of trade apply so that the appellants must plead and prove justification. I am very doubtful whether that is so where restraints exist as part of a code of professional conduct. If the ordinary rule were to apply, any member of a profession who wanted to make more money by disregarding some long standing rule of professional conduct could require the restraint to be justified without himself having to allege and prove that the rule was unreasonable. The onus would be on the body defending the standards of the profession and, unless the tests laid down in the authorities are to be altered, I do not see how the Court could limit the extent to which it would interfere in the domestic affairs of the profession.'

Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest agreed (page 694) that:

> 'It will normally be for a profession itself to decide in regard to its standards and its codes of behaviour, and the mere fact that certain rules are laid down which are severely restrictive will not warrant attack on them if in the interests of members and in the public interest such rules are reasonable. It may be that some professions find it necessary to enjoin [i.e. prohibit] all non-professional activities.'

Lord Upjohn considered the status of a profession in these words (page 703):

> 'A profession is a vocation of the highest standing; it calls on its members to serve (no doubt for reward) the public by offering to them highly technical and always confidential advice and services, which require a different standard of conduct from the tradesman. Its members stand in a different relationship altogether from the man doing ordinary business. . . .
> 'The professional code, however, must be different by the nature of its calling and the reliance placed on it by the public from those carrying on trade and commerce. Those seeking the advice of a professional man are entitled to expect of him the highest standards of ethical conduct. This means that the professional man must submit to some restraints of trade such, to take elementary examples, as a prohibition against advertising and a refusal, by undercutting or otherwise, to snatch work from another practitioner (but of course there is no harm in letting the work come to you). Such restraints (of which I have only given two elementary examples) are necessary to establish, sustain and promote the profession and particularly its ethical standards. The restraints on professional men are justifiable in law [author's italics] for they are necessary not only in the interests of the profession but also in the interests of the public, who trust to the peculiarly high standing and integrity of a profession to serve it well.'

The history of this latter case was outlined in the previous article of this series[16] and presents certain features which may not be appropriate to other professions. In addition to the views expressed by Lord Denning, M.R., in the Court of Appeal, the following dictum of Lord Wilberforce (at [1968] 2 All E.R. 706) appears significant:

> 'It must be remembered, in case conclusions are sought to be drawn from this case which may affect other professions, that this [pharmacy] is a trading profession. Both historically and economically this has been and is of its nature.'

When the Court will not intervene

Although domestic tribunals cannot take the law out of the hands of the Courts, equally the Courts will not allow themselves to be used in any way as an optional alternative to such tribunals. Professional ethics are an obligation assumed over and above the requirements of the law. In Cox v. Green ([1966] 1 All E.R. 268), Plowman, J., held that:

> 'R.S.C., Ord. 15, r. 17 [discretion to make binding declarations of right, whether or not any consequential relief is or could be claimed] is undoubtedly very wide, but there must in my judgment at least be a justifiable dispute between the parties to bring it into operation, and in my judgment the issues between the plaintiff and the defendant here are not justiciable disputes at all. The issue between them does not concern any right of property; it does not concern any right of contract; it does not concern any legal right. The question is purely whether the plaintiff, as the defendant alleges, has been guilty of unethical conduct in a professional way, and that is a matter in my judgment for the appropriate medical tribunal, which is the Central Ethical Committee constituted under the rules of the British Medical Association. . . .
> '[The wide language of R.S.C., Ord. 15, r. 17] is subject to this, that the declaration claimed must not be contrary to the accepted principles on which the Court exercises its jurisdiction, and in my judgment one of those principles is that the Court will not make declarations in a dispute which is not a justiciable dispute.'

The distinguishing feature of Cox v. Green from the other cases herein quoted is that the plaintiff was seeking, not to establish that a particular ethical rule was unreasonable in law, but (in effect) to remove a question of ethics and not of law from the purview of the domestic tribunal.

In outline, then, the domestic jurisdiction of a profession is bounded by these considerations:

(1) A professional society has power to make regulations or by-laws for the conduct of its own affairs, including the discipline of its members, but cannot oust the jurisdiction of the Courts in a dispute arising from the implementation of those by-laws.

(2) Limitations which would in other circumstances be void as in restraint of trade are admissible in a code of professional ethics, so far as they are reasonably necessary to uphold the obligations of members of that profession inter se and to the public at large. If, however, they go beyond what can reasonably be related to professional standards of behaviour, the Courts may intervene, particularly if a man's livelihood is in jeopardy.

(3) The fact that a by-law or other statement uses the language of recommendation rather than of legislation will not prevent the Courts from considering the manner in which it is in fact to be applied.

A code of ethics is of the very nature of a profession; and the small number of reported cases arising from disputes over professional jurisdiction may indicate that the rules formulated by professional societies in general, and accountancy in particular, have been applied with responsibility and discretion and have won widespread acceptance as a result.

Land Commission Practice Notes

IT is the intention of the Land Commission in due course to issue practice notes in booklet form. This, of course, will take time; meanwhile the Commission is anxious that those in the accountancy and other professions who are concerned with the betterment levy and the operation of the Land Commission Act 1967 in general, should be aware of the thinking and practice of the Commission. Accordingly, we reproduce the notes (appropriate to England and Wales), reflecting certain policy decisions or the interpretation of sections of the Act by the Commission which have so far been issued. Others will appear from time to time.

1. Agreements for leases

The Land Commission wishes to draw attention to the effect of section 85 (3) (b) of the Land Commission Act 1967. This subsection provides that, so far as Part III of the Act is concerned, an enforceable agreement for a lease is as good as a lease. Such agreements need not, of course, be formal documents; an exchange of letters may suffice and in some cases the agreement can be oral. The agreement must, however, be such that it creates a tenancy. It must be a complete agreement so that the Courts would be prepared to enforce it (if asked to do so) and to require a formal lease to be granted. The common form of building agreement does not create a tenancy until such time as any conditions precedent to the grant of the formal lease have been fulfilled (e.g., the building has been erected in accordance with the approved specification).

It may be that the tenants under agreements for leases will not appreciate that if the agreement is entered into on or after April 6th, 1967, then the provisions of section 37 of the Act apply to it and the agreement may need to be notified to the Commission. Many agreements strictly require the submission of PD forms but some of them will not, and it is believed that in many cases PD forms are not in fact submitted, even though, strictly, they should be. If the agreement creates a tenancy for a term of years certain of not less than seven years, notification is compulsory. Unless a PD form is submitted, the notification must be done direct to the Regional Office of the Land Commission.

On the receipt of notification, the Commission will carry out the procedure for the assessment of levy, if applicable, and no account will then be taken of the formal lease when, and if, it is granted.

Section 85 (3) (b) also applies where an agreement for a lease was entered into before April 6th, 1967. (This is necessary because otherwise the levy-payer would be denied a base value under Schedule 5 and the Betterment Levy (Tenancies and Reversions) Regulations 1967 if a tenancy was created by an agreement for a lease entered into in the antecedent period.) Where an agreement for a lease was entered into before April 6th, 1967, then if a formal lease is entered into on or after the first appointed day, it will be of no effect so far as Part III is concerned and no levy will be payable. Anyone who wishes to contend that a formal lease has been preceded by an enforceable agreement for the lease entered into before the first appointed day should produce full evidence of the agreement and indicate when possession of the land was taken and the date from which rent was payable.

The subsection has two other effects. It means that enforceable agreements for leases entered into in the antecedent period (July 1st, 1948 – September 22nd, 1965, inclusive) can be used to provide a Schedule 5 base value, even though the agreement might have been followed by a formal lease in the 'interim period' (September 23rd, 1965 – April 5th, 1967, inclusive) or not followed by a formal lease at all. It also means that if the effective agreement is in the interim period, then no Schedule 5 base value can arise, even though there may have been a formal lease on or after the first appointed day.

2. Chargeable acts or events subsequent to Case F

The Land Commission has considered an anomaly in Part III of the Land Commission Act 1967 which arises where a chargeable act or event affects land which has been the subject of a previous chargeable act or event falling within the category of Case F which corresponds to easements.

A previous Schedule 5 (that is, last transaction) base value is extinguished by an event in either Case E or Case F dealing with easements, but for Case E there are provisions which restore part of the last transaction base value if the easement only affects part of the land (see paragraph 16 of Schedule 6).

Unfortunately there are no comparable provisions for Case F, e.g., where pipes are laid by statutory undertakers. The previous base value is wholly extinguished even though the pipes might affect only part of the land.

The following examples compare the position where the first assessment is under Case E (paragraph (a)) with the position where the first assessment is under Case F (paragraph (b)):

(a) Suppose 'X' purchased the fee simple in two adjoining properties of equal value (Blackacre and Whiteacre) for a total consideration of £20,000 which included development value.

After April 6th, 1967, 'X' grants an easement over Whiteacre to 'Y' (the owner of another adjoining property) who notifies the transaction to the Commission.

'X' is then assessed to levy under Case E and uses an apportioned amount (i.e., £10,000) of the consideration paid as his base value. Once this base has been used on the Case E occasion, the effect of paragraphs 5 (1) and 5 (2) of Schedule 5 is to extinguish as a base the amount paid for the whole of the land (i.e., for both Blackacre and Whiteacre). However, Schedule 6 contains (in paragraph 16) provisions which restore the apportioned consideration, i.e. £10,000 deriving from the previous disposition as a base value so far as Blackacre is concerned. This can then be used on a subsequent chargeable act or event affecting Blackacre.

(b) Suppose on the other hand that the grant in respect of Whiteacre had been not of a full easement but of a right for a statutory undertaker to lay a pipe line across Whiteacre. Again, an apportioned amount would be used as base value in the Case F assessment and again the amount paid for the whole of the land would be extinguished as a base value for a subsequent event. This time, however, there is no provision comparable to paragraph 16 of Schedule 6 to restore an apportioned part as a base value so far as Blackacre is concerned. On the occasion, therefore of a subsequent sale or development of Blackacre, 'X' could only use a Schedule 4 current use value base, and thus might be charged levy twice on the same development value.

The Commission have decided that this anomaly will be dealt with by administrative action and part of the Schedule 5 base value will be restored after a Case F (easement) event in the same way as it would be under Case E.

3. Conveyance of land to sub-purchasers and apportionment of levy

Nature of sub-sales

1. Sub-sales arise where a vendor, A, has entered into a contract to sell land to a purchaser, B, but no conveyance to B has been executed. B then enters into a contract to sell to a sub-purchaser, C, and calls upon A to convey direct to C. The sale from B to C is often at an enhanced price. B joins in the conveyance to give a receipt for the part of the purchase money paid to him, to acknowledge the payment to A, and to transfer his equitable interest to C. There can, of course, be several chains in the transaction (where C has agreed to sell to D, D to E, etc.), but for convenience this note is restricted to the case of one sub-purchaser. References to B can be taken to include references to subsequent sub-purchasers, except the final one.

2. The operative part of conveyances of this nature is usually in something like the following form:

'. . . in consideration of the sum of £X paid by C to A (the receipt of which sum A hereby acknowledges and the payment whereof to A, B hereby acknowledges) and of the sum of £Y now paid by C to B (the receipt of which sum B hereby acknowledges), A as beneficial owner at the request of B hereby conveys and B as trustee [or, as beneficial owner] hereby conveys and confirms unto C. ALL THAT etc. . . . TO HOLD the same unto C in fee simple'.

A direct conveyance from A to C is used both for convenience and because it can result in a saving of stamp duty.

Incidence of levy

3. In a Case A disposition of a simple conveyance on sale, A, the grantor, the owner of the fee simple, is liable to pay the whole of the levy (section 36 (2)). In the example quoted above, B never obtains the fee simple and so he never becomes the grantor for the purpose of the Act. However, section 36 (3) deals with this type of case where part of the consideration is payable to someone to whom the grantor has previously agreed to sell the land (i.e., B). It provides that A and B can apply to the Commission for an apportionment of levy between them. If the Commission agree to make a formal apportionment then A and B are liable only for the part of the levy apportioned on each of them; if the Commission do not make a formal apportionment then A and B are jointly and severally liable for the whole of the levy.

Assessment of levy

4. This is dealt with in section 44. Notice of the assessment of levy is to be served either for the whole amount on both A and B, or for the apportioned amounts (under subsection (2) (b)) if the Commission have agreed to make a formal apportionment.

Procedure

5. It is the Commission's intention in all cases to serve notices on both A and B for the whole amount of the levy, so that in due course, when the assessment becomes operative, A and B will be jointly and severally liable for the whole of the levy. The Commission will not normally make a formal apportionment of levy under section 36 (3).

6. However, if A and B both make a request in writing, the Commission will always be prepared to indicate informally how the levy would have been divided between the parties had the Commission made a formal apportionment. Such a request should preferably be made after the service of the notices of assessment of levy and it should be addressed to the Regional Office of the Commission from which the notices were issued. In normal cases the Commission think it reasonable that the levy should be divided between the parties in the same way as it would have been split had the transfer been effected by separate conveyances from A to B and from B to C.

7. The Commission will also be prepared to tell both parties when the total amount of levy has been paid regardless of who in fact has paid the levy. This will enable both parties to know that their joint and several liability is at an end. Requests for this information should also be addressed to the Regional Office from which the original notice of assessment was issued.

8. There is one case where the Commission will be prepared to make a formal apportionment. This arises where the Commission are prepared to allow one of the parties (but not the other) to give security and to pay his share by instalments. It would clearly not be reasonable for the other party to have a contingent joint and several liability hanging over him for the whole duration of the instalment agreement. At this stage, with little experience to draw on, the Commission are unable to decide the general policy on payments by instalments. For the time being, therefore, the procedure for this special case will be as follows:

(a) The Commission will serve notice of assessment of levy in the full amount on both parties in the usual way. These notices will not, of course, contain a section 45 (2) (b) statement.

(b) Both parties should submit to the Regional Office a request in writing for an apportionment. This request should either contain details of how the parties would like the levy apportioned or an undertaking to accept the Commission's apportionment.

(c) At the same time the party wishing to pay by instalments should submit a statement of the reasons for his request and details of the security he is prepared to offer.

(d) If the Commission is prepared to agree to the requests, each party will be invited to submit a formal counter-notice under section 46, stating the apportioned amounts as the amounts required to be stated by section 46 (4).

(e) This 'objection' will then be settled by agreement under section 48 (1); the original notices will be varied by substituting the apportioned amounts and, in one case, by providing for payment by instalments. The original notices (as varied) will then become operative under section 49 (1) (b).

The requests referred to in (b) and (c) above should be submitted immediately on receipt of the notices of assessment so that the Commission can consider the request in sufficient time to enable the formal counter-notice to be served within the statutory period of two months.

Expenditure on improvement and ancillary rights

9. It may happen that B, the original purchaser, is let into possession of the land on the strength of his contract with A and incurs expenditure on improvements and ancillary rights which increases the development value of the land as mentioned in Part V of Schedule 4. 'Grantor' and 'chargeable owner' in this connection mean the owner of the fee simple, but if the conveyance is direct from A to C, B never gets the fee simple. The Commission are advised that in such a case B will not be able to deduct the expenditure he had incurred on improvements and ancillary rights in the calculation of the net development value.

10. Purchasers and their professional advisers should thus consider their position carefully before calling upon their vendors to convey direct to sub-purchasers rather than effecting the transaction by separate conveyances.

4. Exemption of single family dwelling-house

Section 61 of the Land Commission Act 1967 confers an exemption from betterment levy on the interest held by a person who owned land at September 23rd, 1965, and who wishes to build a dwelling-house for himself or for a member of his family as defined in the Act.

Hardship could occur in the application of this section when the land is held at all material times by joint tenants, one of whom is a bare trustee. This would be the case, for instance, where a husband who owned the land died, and at September 23rd, 1965, the land was vested in his widow as co-executrix with, for example, the family solicitor. If now the widow proposed to build a house for her son, it could not strictly be said that the son is a member of the owner's family since the owner is the widow and the solicitor executor together.

The Land Commission have decided that in cases where the intention of section 61 is frustrated because it makes no provision for such co-ownership, applications for exemption under section 61 will be favourably entertained.

5. Surrenders of tenancies and renewals, extensions and variations of tenancies

Part I – Surrenders of tenancies

From time to time inquiries are made at Regional Offices of the Land Commission as to whether a surrender of a tenancy will be regarded by the Commission as falling within Case A (as an assignment on sale), or will not be a chargeable act or event because the surrender is coupled with the grant of a new tenancy (see section 85 (3) of the Land Commission Act 1967).

The following table may help levy-payers and their advisers in deciding this question. It relates, of course, only to tenancies granted, renewed or extended for a term of years certain of seven years or more or for less than seven years if notified to the Commission:

Type of surrender	Case (if any)
1. Surrender for valuable consideration NOT made in consideration of the grant of a new tenancy of the same land	Case A
2. Surrender for valuable consideration NOT made in pursuance of an agreement for the grant of a new tenancy of the same land	Case A
3. Surrender NOT for valuable consideration	No case in any circumstances
4. Surrender for valuable consideration made in consideration of the grant of a new tenancy of the same land	No case on surrender but see Case F
5. Surrender for valuable consideration made in pursuance of an agreement for the grant of a new tenancy of the same land	No case on surrender but see Case F
6. Surrender for valuable consideration consisting of or including the grant of a new tenancy of different land	Case A (and the new grant is Case B)
7. Surrender for valuable consideration consisting of or including an agreement for the grant of a new tenancy of different land	Case A (and the new grant is Case B)
8. Surrender for valuable consideration consisting of or including the grant of a tenancy of the same land and some different land	Case A (and the new tenancy is Case B)
9. Surrender for valuable consideration including or consisting of an agreement for the grant of a new tenancy of the same land and some different land	Case A (and the new tenancy is Case B)
10. Surrender of part of the land in the tenancy follows the same rules as for the surrender of the tenancy of the whole of the land	See above

Part II – Renewals, extensions and variations of tenancies

Grants of new leases between the same landlord and the same tenant and renewals, extensions and variations of tenancies, can fall within either Case B or Case F of the Land Commission Act 1967. In general terms a disposition will be:

Case B if the 'old' tenancy continues unchanged to its natural end.

Case F if the 'old' tenancy is varied in the manner mentioned in section 35 (2) (b) of the Act or prematurely terminated by surrender as a result of the renewal or extension.

However, it should be noted that the disposition will NOT be Case F if it involves land additional to that included in the 'old' tenancy.

Because of differences in the notification procedure, levy-payers and their advisers will need to consider into which Case a disposition of this nature falls. Notification in Case B is compulsory where a tenancy is granted for seven years or more and may be effected by the submission of a PD form when the tenancy agreement or lease is stamped. Notification in Case F is voluntary, however, (whatever the term of the tenancy as renewed or extended) and the submission of a PD form will NOT constitute notification. Notification in Case F should be effected on form BL6 direct to the appropriate Regional Office of the Land Commission. A disposition of this nature will often be made in order to facilitate development and it may thus be advantageous for the grantee to notify the disposition. This is because the consideration given for a disposition which has been notified to the Commission can be taken into account as a Schedule 5 base value on a later chargeable occasion when, for example, the grantee comes to sell, lease or develop the land which was the subject of the disposition.

The Land Commission have prepared the following notes and examples to illustrate the application of the general rules given above and to provide further guidance as to whether dispositions granting, renewing, extending and varying leases fall within Case B or Case F.

Case B

1. If the existing tenancy for a fixed term carries on unchanged to its natural end, and THEN a new tenancy commences, the disposition creating this new tenancy will be regarded as falling within Case B, irrespective of whether this disposition is made during the term of the existing tenancy or at its end. The important thing is that the disposition creating the new tenancy shall not take effect in possession until the existing tenancy has run its course. These dispositions are renewals but NOT renewals regarded as falling within Case F. Renewals which are regarded as falling within Case F are dealt with in 2 below.

Example:

A grants B a lease in 1960 which is for 21 years. In 1975, A agrees to grant B a new lease at a new (or the same) rent for a further twenty-one years from 1981 on the expiration of the old lease. This is Case B.

Case F

2. If the existing tenancy is in any way brought to an end by the disposition before it has run its course and a new tenancy commences immediately (i.e., before the date on which the existing tenancy would have ended) this is Case F. This state of affairs can come about in several ways.

Examples:

Suppose in each case A grants B a lease in 1960 which is for 21 years, then

(a) In 1975 B can surrender this lease to A and A can grant B a new lease at a new (or the same) rent for a period ending after 1981 – Case F.

(b) In 1975 A simply grants B a new lease (starting straight away) at a new (or the same) rent for a period ending after 1981. There is no mention of a surrender, but the lease will effect a surrender by operation of law – Case F.

(c) In 1975 A and B simply extend the term of the lease, e.g., by an endorsement saying that the lease shall have effect as if it were for 42 years instead of 21. In law this operates as a surrender of the old tenancy and the grant of a new one and is Case F.

(d) In 1975 A and B for valuable consideration (e.g., capital payment or increased rent) vary the terms and conditions of a tenancy by releasing or modifying a covenant whereby the development of any land comprised in the tenancy is restricted. This is Case F and it is still Case F if the variation is

(i) brought about by a formal surrender and a formal new lease; or

(ii) brought about by an agreement simply to vary the terms, and it is immaterial whether the variation also provides for an alteration in the length of the lease.

Special case

3. If the new lease includes land in addition to the land in the old lease, this is Case B, and the allowance for development value already paid for by the landlord on the grant of the old tenancy is given by Regulation 15 of the Tenancies and Reversions Regulations – i.e., the premature termination of a lease.

6. Exemption of charities from betterment levy

This practice note does not deal with charities established in Scotland and conducting activities in England and Wales. (See the Scottish practice note on this subject.)

1. Section 57 of the Land Commission Act provides exemption from betterment levy, in certain circumstances, to any institution or organization established for charitable purposes only.

2. On a sale of land or grant of a lease exemption is available if the interest sold or the interest out of which the lease is granted is held by, or in trust for, the charity and – either forms, part of the permanent endowment of the charity (land is taken to form part of the permanent endowment if the proceeds of sale could only be applied to capital purposes and not applied as income), or has been used wholly or mainly for the purposes of the charity for at least a year, and, if that use has ceased, a use wholly or mainly for purposes other than those of a charity has not lasted for more than five years thereafter (this is referred to as functional land).

3. A charity is exempt from betterment levy in respect of a project of material development if either of the conditions in the preceding paragraph are fulfilled as regards the interest of the charity or if the project of material development which is to be carried out is wholly or mainly for the purposes of the charity.

4. Before exemption can be granted, it is necessary for the Land Commission to be satisfied that the claimant organization falls within the definition of a charity contained in the Land Commission Act. Inclusion in the register of charities kept by the Charity Commissioners is accepted as conclusive proof of charitable status. Any inquiry which the Land Commission may make about the status of a registered charity will simply be to verify registration. This also applies to registration with the Department of Science and Education.

5. The Land Commission have made arrangements to consider with the Charity Commissioners whether an organization which does not appear on the register of charities satisfies the definition of a charity in the Land Commission Act. This procedure will enable the Land Commission, in granting exemptions to charities, to keep in step with the decisions of the Charity Commissioners on charitable status.

6. To enable this to be done and also to decide whether the land concerned forms part of the permanent endowment of the charity, the Land Commission will usually need to ask the charity to produce the following information and documents:

(a) Details of the land concerned, e.g., situation and nature of interest.

(b) A copy of the instrument in which the trusts affecting the interest in land are declared (e.g., conveyance or declaration of trust).

(c) A copy of the governing instrument of the institution (e.g. rules constitution or scheme).

(d) Date and reference of Charity Commission Order, if any, authorizing the disposal of the interest in land.

(e) Any reference by which the institution is known by the Charity Commission.

7. If it is claimed that the land concerned is functional land (see paragraph 2) the Commission will usually seek to decide this question before looking at the question whether the land forms part of the permanent endowment. Whether or not land is functional land is a question of fact which in most cases will be capable of being settled by correspondence.

7. Payment of consideration deferred

1. Where payment of the consideration for a disposition within section 29 (Case A) or section 30 (Case B) of the Land Commission Act 1967 is deferred in accordance with the terms of that disposition, the amount of the consideration for the purposes of betterment levy is determined in accordance with paragraphs 1 (Case A) and 7 to 9 (Case B) of Schedule 4 to the Act as supplemented by paragraphs 1 to 3 of Schedule 6. In such cases the Commission will evaluate the consideration as follows:

(a) Case A – Covenants contained in conveyances to pay additional sums on a contingency.
Where the consideration for a conveyance is a specified sum, with a covenant (contained in the conveyance) by the purchaser to pay further sums on obtaining planning permission or development taking place, the value to the vendor of the purchaser's covenant, ascertained at the date of conveyance, will be included as part of the consideration given for the conveyance.

(b) Case B – Deferred premiums
Where the payment of a premium is deferred under the terms of a tenancy, the value of the right to receive the future premium will be quantified as at the time of the disposition.

2. Under the provisions of paragraph 1 (e) of Schedule 6, the consideration given or to be given for a disposition (whether made before or after the passing of the Act) shall, subject to the provisions of that Schedule, take into account, in addition to the purchase price (if any), any other thing representing money or money's worth which, in accordance with those terms, was or is done or agreed to be done. In the opinion of the Commission the right to recover a capital sum at some time in the future is within 'any other thing representing money or money's worth', etc.

3. This means that there must be taken into account, in addition to the purchase price, the benefit of the purchaser's covenant. The basis of valuation is governed by paragraph 4 (3) of Schedule 6. This is the price which the benefit of that covenant might reasonably be expected to fetch on a sale in the open market at the date of the levy event. The valuation will take into account such things as the degree of probability of the contingency upon which the payment will become due occurring, and also the antipated period which will elapse before any payment is made.

4. When, on the occasion of a subsequent chargeable act or event, it is necessary to ascertain the amount of the consideration paid by the then present chargeable owner when he purchased the land, for the purpose of establishing a base value under Schedule 5 of the Act, the same figure will be used. Any event which could not reasonably have been foreseen at the date of the original disposition will be disregarded.

5. The following example serves to illustrate the Commission's practice:

'A vendor 'X' sells land to a purchaser 'Y' for £10,000 and 'Y' covenants in the conveyance to pay 'X' a further sum of £90,000 if planning permission for residential development of the land is granted within ten years following the date of the disposition. The Commission might consider that in the circumstances of this particular case the value of the covenant (at the date of the disposition) is £15,000.

In the assessment to levy under Case A which will be made upon 'X' the consideration he received will be taken to be £25,000.

Planning permission is granted after four years and 'Y' pays £90,000 to 'X'. This is not a chargeable act or event under the Act.

After another year 'Y' begins a project of material development on the land. In the assessment to levy under Case C which will be made upon 'Y' the base value under under Schedule 5 (if applicable) will be £25,000 (subject to any adjustment under Schedule 5 paragraph 9).

8. Surrenders of leases by operation of law

Section 85 (3) (a) of the Land Commission Act 1967 provides that the surrender of a tenancy to a landlord, if made for valuable consideration, shall be treated as an assignment on sale of the tenancy to that landlord. Thus such a surrender will be a chargeable act or event in Case A (under section 29 (1) (c)) if the tenancy surrendered was granted, renewed or extended for a term of years certain of not less than seven years, and in this case the surrender will be compulsorily notifiable to the appropriate Regional Office of the Commission. If the tenancy surrendered was granted, renewed or extended for a term of years certain of less than seven years, the surrender will be a chargeable act or event if it is voluntarily notified. In each case, the person to notify the Commission is the landlord.

Landlords and their advisers will accordingly need to remember that section 85 (3) (a) applies to the surrender of a lease regardless of whether that surrender is effected expressly or by operation of law. There can be occasions where a surrender takes place without any instrument or written document at all being employed. It will, nevertheless, be a disposition within the definition in section 99 (1) and the provisions of the Land Commission Act apply in such a case in just the same way as they do in the case of an express surrender.

There is one case where a surrender of a tenancy (whether express or implied) is NOT treated as an assignment on sale of that tenancy. This is where the surrender is made in consideration of, or in pursuance of an agreement for, the grant of a new tenancy (see proviso to section 85 (3)).

9. Waiver of interest on postponement of levy

1. Section 45 (2) of the Land Commission Act 1967 provides (inter alia) that the Land Commission may, if they think fit, state in a notice of assessment that if the person on whom the notice is served makes written application the collection of the levy or part of it will be postponed to such future date as may be determined.

2. The Commission are prepared to postpone collection of levy in those cases covered by the Betterment Levy (Waiver of Interest) Regulations, 1967 (S.I. 1967, No. 338). These are cases in which levy is chargeable in respect of an assessable interest in the relevant land, or in part of that land –

(a) which at the relevant date is an interest in reversion expectant (whether immediately or not) on the termination of a tenancy on that land, or in part of that land; or

(b) where the relevant project consists of the erection of one or more houses of which the occupation and user will in the opinion of the Commission fall within the provisions of section 72 of the Local Government Act 1929 (see footnote (i)); or

(c) where the relevant project consists of the erection or construction of a building intended to be used wholly or mainly for the purpose of the taking of physical recreation therein; or

(d) where the relevant project consists of the erection or construction of an extension to an industrial building which was in existence on April 6th, 1967; or

(e) where the relevant project consists of development or use authorized by planning permission granted for a limited period (see footnote (ii)).

3. In such cases the person on whom the notice is served is still liable for the full amount of the levy but the Commission will agree not to collect it until such time as the postponement ceases. During the period of postponement interest will be waived on the amount of levy outstanding in accordance with the Betterment Levy (Waiver of Interest) Regulations, 1967 (S.I. 1967, No. 338), which relate to these categories of cases. Interest will, however, begin to accrue from the date on which the postponement comes to an end at the rate in operation at that time.

4. (a) In cases where the relevant project consists of development or use authorized by planning permission granted for a limited period only part of any levy due will be postponed. The amount which the Commission will collect initially will be that proportion of the total sum which the period of the planning permission bears to twenty years. The remainder of the levy will be postponed but a further sum, in the same proportion, will be collected if a further planning permission is granted. Thus if planning permission is originally granted for five years, one-quarter will be collected at the outset and three-quarters (i.e., fifteen-twentieths) will be postponed. If on the expiration of the first five years planning permission is granted for a further five years the Commission will collect a further five-twentieths of the levy originally assessed.

(b) Planning consents granted for advertisements are subject to a statutory time limit of not more than five years by virtue of Regulation 18 of the Town and Country Planning (Control of Advertisements) Regulations 1960. However, advertisers do not usually apply for the renewal of such consents, because they are content to rely on Regulation 18 (5). This regulation allows advertisers to continue to display advertisements on the expiry of this statutory time limit, subject to any express action by the local planning authority to the contrary.

In the case of advertisements granted consent on this basis, one-quarter of the levy payable will be collected initially and the rest postponed. At the end of the five years, one-twentieth of the sum originally assessed will be collected each year for so long as the advertisement remains displayed until the total amount has been collected. Where advertisements are displayed following a consent on which the local planning authority has imposed an express time limit (i.e., one which negatives the provisions of Regulation 18 (5)) the normal rules set out in (a) above, will apply.

(c) It should not be forgotten, however, that postponement will end (in both types of case) on the occurrence of the next chargeable act or event and the whole of the levy will then be payable. This will be so, however soon this next chargeable act or event occurs even if it is during the first five years. This will cause no hardship because the levy-payer's base value on this second chargeable act or event will be increased by the value of the planning permission ignoring the time limit condition. It is right, therefore, that the Commission should receive the levy based on this assumption of an unconditional planning permission.

5. The event or events which will determine the postponement of levy will be set out in the notice of assessment. In the case referred to in paragraph 2 (e) above this will be on the occasion of the next chargeable act or event (as explained in paragraph 4). Generally, in all other cases, such determining events are tied to the occasion when the person liable to levy disposes of his interest in the land or, in 2 (a) above, for example, he obtains possession of the land on which the project was carried out by buying out the interest held by the tenant. In the case of agricultural dwellings postponement will continue so long as the dwelling remains in agricultural use. This means that postponement will not necessarily cease when the dwelling is sold by the person charged to levy. It must be remembered, however, that postponement will be subject to security having been provided and that this will often take the form of a charge on the dwelling. It will, of course, be for the purchaser to decide whether he is prepared to purchase the dwelling subject to a charge. In any case of postponement it is open to the person liable to levy to end the postponement at any time by serving a written notice to that effect upon the Commission.

6. Where postponement is requested section 52 (1) of the Act enables the Commission to require such security as will ensure the payment with interest of so much of the principal amount of the levy as will remain unpaid. This may take the form of a charge on land or such other type of security as may in the circumstances appear reasonably sufficient to the Commission.

7. Although section 52 empowers the Commission to recover any administrative or other expenses (including stamp duty) which they have incurred in connection with taking security it will not be the practice of the Commission to do so in cases where waiver of interest will apply.

Footnotes:

(i) Section 72 of the Local Government Act 1929 reads: As from the first day of April, nineteen hundred and thirty, the gross value for rating purposes of a house occupied in connection with agricultural land and used as the dwelling-house of a person who –

(a) is primarily engaged in carrying on or directing agricultural operations on that land; or

(b) is employed in agricultural operations on that land in the service of the occupier thereof and is entitled, whether as tenant or otherwise, so to use the house only while so employed, shall, so long as the house is so occupied and used, be estimated by reference to the rent at which the house might reasonably be expected to let from year to year if it could not be occupied and used otherwise than as aforesaid.

(ii) including consents granted for advertisements.

Studies in Cost Analysis

Second edition, edited by Professor DAVID SOLOMONS, B.COM., D.SC.(ECON.), F.C.A.

Sweet & Maxwell Ltd, London. 105*s*.

In this second edition of a book which has been out of print for a number of years, Professor David Solomons, of the Wharton School of Finance, University of Pennsylvania, has collected together a selection of 34 essays written by distinguished writers in the field of cost analysis.

The works are thought-provoking and worthy of serious study by all accountants and students of accountancy seeking an insight into the latest developments, in both theory and practice, in this field over the last fifteen years.

The essays are collected under various topic headings, such as – Retrospect and Prospect – Concepts of Cost Behaviour – Pricing and Market Decisions – Cost Control – Accounting and Mathematical Programming.

This is not, of course, a substitute for the conventional textbook on cost accounting and analysis but is rather a book of supplementary readings.

The Game of Budget Control

by G. H. HOFSTEDE.

Tavistock Publications Ltd, London (in association with Van Gorcum & Co, NV, Netherlands). 45*s*.

The literature on budgetary control contains much conventional wisdom on the methods and purposes of budgeting but very little evidence of its effects on managers and managerial performance. In a rigorously researched study of six Dutch manufacturing companies, Dr Hofstede has now provided some fascinating insights into the motivational effects of management control systems. He demonstrates the significance of line relationships and the controller's function as management educator.

One of the more startling suggestions, for the accountant, is the notion of encouraging 'gaming' in budgetary procedures. It is argued that 'calculated inefficiency' – an intentional vagueness in setting goals – is psychologically necessary for motivation. This leads to the recommendation of control limits for guiding performance rather as in quality control procedures. These performance budgets are distinguished from the most likely budget result usually included in the co-ordination of plans.

The study employs concepts developed from systems theory, psychology and organization theory. It will prove a useful reference work for the growing number of students and researchers in British business schools who are interested in accounting problems. It is an example of careful research methodology involving interviews, questionnaire design and the use of correlations and factor analysis. The research data, however, is carefully summarized and the book is very readable. Although based on Dutch experience, the results seem relevant to any company using budgetary systems.

The book makes a contribution to our knowledge of the budgeting process and will be important to the accountant who wants to understand budgetary control, rather than merely implement and operate a mechanistic system.

Taxation of Capital Gains

Second Cumulative Supplement by PERCY F. HUGHES, F.C.I.S., and K. R. TINGLEY, F.A.C.C.A.

Taxation Publishing Co, London. 15*s*.

This supplement of nearly 200 pages brings in the changes made by the Finance Act 1967 – a particularly difficult Act, not least in section 33 and Schedule 14 which are designed to avoid an overlap between capital gains tax and betterment levy when land having development value is sold. A whole chapter is devoted to this extremely complicated subject, including a brief resumé of the betterment levy provisions. Unlike so many other expositions of the subject, this one is rich in arithmetical examples which bring out the meaning of the legislation in a way which cannot be done by mere words.

Besides expounding the section 33 provisions, the supplement contains a noter-up of the pages of the main volume which are affected. The reviewer is looking forward to the supplement which will cover the Finance Act 1968.

Commercial and Industrial Law

by GWYNETH ROBERTS, LL.B., and WILLIAM T. MAJOR, M.A., LL.B.

Economics of Public Finance

by E. SEDDON, M.A.

Macdonald & Evans. (M. & E. Handbook Series.) 15*s* and 12*s* 6*d* respectively.

Readers familiar with the very useful M. & E. Handbook series will know what to expect from these two works. Students using them for lecture notes will not be disappointed with the wealth of well-organized material that they contain. The first, on commercial and industrial law, is an excellent example of compression for the student who does not wish to take lecture notes, while Mr Seddon covers all aspects of public finance, and on the assumption that students are also attending lectures on the subject, his book should prove a useful medium for pre-examination revision.

The Elements of Probability and Sampling

by FRANK A. FRIDAY.

Basil Blackwell. Cloth. 35*s*. Paperback 17*s* 6*d*.

The basis of modern statistical method is sampling and without a clear understanding of its mathematical basis, it is impossible to appreciate the value of modern statistical techniques. Unfortunately, even elementary probability theory is not always easy to understand and the number of books which take the reader gently through the technicalities without him losing heart is very small indeed. This brief study, based on the late Mr Friday's writings, is as helpful as any work on this subject for the non-mathematician, and the application of this theory to statistics is clearly expounded.

The Spell of Mathematics

by W. J. REICHMANN.

Methuen & Co. 35*s*.

There is no shortage of books which seek to enliven the mathematically inclined reader's leisure by examining the basis of various problems of interest to mathematicians, or to explain some of the neater proofs. For the reader already familiar with these works, this book does not add a great deal. The question is whether for the more general reader, the exposition is simple enough for him to appreciate the ingenuity and subtleties which characterize mathematics.

This book is clearly written and Mr Reichmann is a good expositor. It would make a useful present for a boy or girl taking mathematics in the sixth form, or for the accountant who enjoyed his school mathematics more years ago than he cares to remember and would like a refresher course.

Finance and Commerce

Ernest Scragg

THE report and accounts of Ernest Scragg & Sons (Holdings) Ltd are notable for two points. One is that they are presented in a changed and considerably improved form and the other is that they were in shareholders' hands by December 16th. The financial year runs to September 30th and since the 1966–67 accounts were not issued until February 27th, 1968, there was marked acceleration in the pace of reporting.

Mr E. P. R. Scragg, the chairman, attributes the acceleration to 'reorganized accounting routines' and points out that the earlier presentation has been achieved 'despite the very substantial increase in work involved'. That, presumably, is a reference to the detailed information required under the 1967 Act.

At that point some digression may be permitted on the subject of company comments on the information that the 1967 Act demands and the extent to which there is still a considerable amount of debate on the necessity or desirability of much of the information that now has to be given.

One of the most direct views this column has come across is that of Mr Campnel Edwards, J.P., chairman of Bridport-Gundry Ltd, the company which describes itself as 'netmakers to the world'. Mr Edwards, towards the end of his statement with the accounts, simply says: 'On other pages of this report will be found various vital statistics required by the 1967 Companies Act. You may draw from them such conclusions as you can.'

No summary

While the Ernest Scragg reporting and accounting acceleration is to be commended, as is also the clarity of the presentation of the accounts themselves, it is a pity that the report does not include a summary of financial events over the past few years. Such a summary would make extremely interesting reading, for the earnings performance of the Scragg group is nothing if not volatile.

Pre-tax profits in the year under review, it will be seen from the accounts, were a shade over £3 million against the previous year's £1,170,000. In 1965–66, profits were only £352,000; the year before that £972,000, in 1963–64 £1,129,000 and in 1962–63 £400,000.

Beginning in 1962–63, and adjusting payments for intervening scrip issues, the dividend record runs 22·5, 39·1, 42·5, 25, 45 and now, by force of dividend limitation circumstances, 46·5 per cent. This irregular earnings pattern turns on the Scragg group's occupation of designing, developing, manufacturing, installing and servicing textile machinery, particularly for the processing of synthetic yarns. Registered offices at Macclesfield indicate to those with a head for industrial geography the group's roots.

New machine

Pride of the business is currently the CS12 600 False Twist Crimping Machine on which the Council of Industrial Design conferred one of the six capital goods awards in 1968 – out of 196 submissions. The award gives the Scragg group the unique distinction of being the first company ever to receive a Council of Industrial Design award for a textile machine of any type.

The CS12 600 is the latest thing in the production of textured yarns extensively used in the jersey, hosiery stretch fabric and other trades. In earnings terms, however, 1967–68 was not the year of the CS12 600, since production of the new machine and rationalization of other production was still, to some extent, being organized.

For £420,000, works were bought at Broadheath, Altrincham, in order to centralize and rationalize the assembly of doubling, uptwisting and other machines, and at Langley considerable extensions to sub-assembly and machine erection works in order to increase the large-scale flow of the new machine only became operational last July.

But the extent to which production was stepped up is made clear enough in the turnover figure. With that turnover came something akin to a profit explosion, taking earnings to a record high level.

Outlook

The chairman describes the current year outlook as 'exceptionally good' and considers that turnover should be approximately doubled. The order position is 'most satisfactory and sales continue at a very high level'. But not content with the success of its latest machine, the group has major developments in hand. There are in fact so many new projects in train that it has been decided to increase the available research and development space and personnel by 50 per cent and this should be achieved during the 'very early part of 1969'.

The enormous demand for the CS12 600 machine caused the company to raise its production targets repeatedly in an endeavour to maintain reasonable delivery. A further large extension at the Langley works is just coming into production.

Textured yarn is a textile sphere in which the word 'boom' is truly applicable. This year, UK production will be twice the 1966 level and even that rate of growth is expected to be surpassed with demand continuing unabated and production increasing by at least a 15 per cent compound rate of growth during the next five years. With similar, even higher, growth rates anticipated in the US and Western Germany, the Scragg group clearly has considerable growth scope.

A GUIDE TO STOCK CONTROL

A. BATTERSBY

(A B.I.M./PITMAN JOINT PUBLICATION)

20*s* net: 20*s* 10*d* including postage

Since it first appeared in 1962 this stimulating little book has won wide acceptance. The author illustrates the importance of his subject by quoting an official estimate of £9,000 million as the value of materials held by British Industry; and he makes the startling claim that modern methods of stock control could reduce this figure by 10 or 20 per cent. With the aid of a mythical product, he traces the operation of the various systems in common use.

Simple diagrams and a lively text combine to produce a survey of the stores control function which can be quickly and painlessly absorbed.

CITY NOTES

SINCE there is hardly a 'chartist' in the business who is prepared to read the equity market with any precision; one way or the other it is not surprising that whatever the market does, it dumbfounds at least 50 per cent of stockbrokers and commentators alike. Having engaged in its New Year flurry, the market eased back only to be buoyed up again by an outburst of take-over activity and take-over rumour which has reached an unprecedented level.

It is easy to accuse 'the market', and investors and operators at large, as being take-over mad but when rumour after rumour and price rise after price rise brings take-over confirmation, the market is being 'mad' to good effect. While this fever lasts and, while it continues to attract investment money, in fact, to create investment money, there can hardly be any run-back in the equity market as a whole.

The toughest credit pressure ever experienced, coupled with the highest-ever effective level of interest rates may, in theory, mean restriction, deflation and a lower level of equity prices. But if current take-over conditions continue, the theory behind the effect of credit pressure and high interest rates may well just remain theory.

Cause and effect do not always run true in the stock-markets. The effect of take-overs and bids on price may well be stronger than the Government's 'cause' of a balance of payments surplus by restriction.

*   *   *   *

THE General Foods bid for the Rowntree company is typical of current bid situations. It was heralded by a strong and persistent rise in the prices of the company's shares and by the now traditional 'denials' from the company's boardroom. Each denial merely served to strengthen the market view that a bid was on the way and only the identity of the bidder was anything of a problem. General Foods was mentioned along with a number of other American possibilities and General Foods it proved to be. At this stage of the proceedings, with the Rowntree share price ahead of the General Foods, phase two of the take-over situation is developing just as traditionally as did the first phase.

*   *   *   *

BUYING shares on the first-hard news of a take-over bid is now firmly established as the short-term gain certainty of the stock-market. Such a move used to be an extremely courageous operation but, under present conditions, it is as near as anything can be to a certainty in the equity market. Even the apparently most unlikely cases turn out to be profitable. City of London Real Property is a current case in point. The original bid in the £5-a-share region was considered fair but subsequent buyers at up to £7 a share see handsome short-term profits now.

*   *   *   *

THAT the Post Office regional directors have been instructed to cut expenditure by £4 million in the remaining eleven weeks of the financial year will be translated by many as proof of the abject failure of the 'two-tier post'. The public was not fooled by the publicity nonsense which preceded the introduction of the fivepenny post. Being incensed that the Post Office thought it could take them for a ride, the public thereupon not only shunned the fivepenny post but reduced its use of the fourpenny post as well. It is beyond comprehension that the GPO should have budgeted on the basis that people would pay fivepence for a service they could adequately use for fourpence. Had the Post Office been straightforward in the first place, stated the facts and put the letter post rate up to fivepence, there would inevitably have been complaints, but the Post Office would not have experienced the same extent of lost business – and lost goodwill. Were a public company to operate in this way the market in the shares would reflect severe investment doubts about the calibre of management.

Minimum Study Leave

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

Clause 3 (iv) (d) of standard articles provides that the articled clerk shall in addition to other prescribed study leave, receive nine weeks' leave at times approved by the principal. This is a prescribed provision which may be varied only with the consent of the Council.

Where the parties themselves agree, the Council will accept a reduction of this period from nine weeks to six weeks where the articled clerk is exempted from passing the Intermediate examination:

(i) under bye-law 88 (a) by virtue of having successfully completed a degree course approved under bye-law 68; or

(ii) under bye-law 88 (b) by virtue of age and experience.

Those who during articled service follow a full-time course which leads to exemption from the Intermediate examination under bye-law 88 (c) do not come within the scope of this statement as the additional nine weeks leave forms part of the study leave used for that course.

Eligibility to Sit Intermediate Examination – By-law 83

The Council approved the following statement for publication:

Under the provisions of bye-law 83 no candidate is permitted to present himself for the Intermediate examination after the completion of his period of service under articles unless the Council, in any case in which it considers that there are exceptional circumstances, otherwise decides.

The Council wishes to emphasize that discretion will normally be exercised only where a student has been prevented from having a reasonable number of attempts at the Intermediate examination and is able to satisfy the Examination Committee that there are good and sufficient reasons.

Crisis of Confidence

SIR, – Your recent leader (January 4th issue) prompts me to write to you. So much has been written on the general subject of what I call the 'management of Great Britain' that I hesitate to add to the plethora of opinions, criticisms, advice and so on. It does not seem, however, that much more than palliatives have so far been examined or offered.

I suggest therefore that you should invite contributions to your journal aimed at curing the 'sick man of Europe'. We need to go back to 'basic principles'.

It is more than a question of politics. Indeed, I found Professor Kaldor's letter to The Times positively dangerous and certainly misleading.

It would be laughable if it were not such a serious matter that in this 'computer age' we are still reduced to hoping that certain figures will be better than expected or not as bad as was feared. We ought to know – and on a daily basis – so that the appropriate corrective action can be taken in time. But let me get back to first principles.

There are something like 55 million people in Great Britain today but the gross domestic product is running at only about £28,000 million. Less than half of the 55 million can and do work but even if we say it is 28 million, the GDP per person is only £1,000 per annum. Of this £1,000 per person per annum, central government is already spending on 'essential services' more than 50 per cent. In the fiscal year commencing April 6th, 1969, the central government proposes to spend £20,000 million which is five-sevenths of the GDP!

From these figures emerges the first basic principle: all expenditure, private and public for any fiscal year must be contained within the value of the GDP for the previous year. The second principle can then be postulated. Central government expenditure must always be limited to a reasonable percentage of the same GDP. What is 'reasonable' will be determined by a number of factors but it should never under any circumstances exceed 45 per cent of the GDP – not even to prosecute a war or send a man to Mars!

The third principle would deal with local government expenditure which would again be tied into the GDP and the controlling parameter would be expressed as a percentage thereof.

The fourth and perhaps the most important principle which requires stating is that each government – no matter what its political colour – has a duty to the community to demonstrate on a day-to-day basis, that the policies being pursued as a result of an election mandate, are soundly based financially. Any proposal to borrow money abroad for fanciful (Concorde!) or even worth-while projects (Channel tunnel!) would mean the automatic dissolution of Parliament.

It may not be generally known but it certainly ought to be that this Government proposes to spend £20,000 million in 1969–70 out of an estimated tax revenue of £13,000 million! A simple calculation will show that this offends against principles 1, 2 and 4 and by inference, principle 3. At the moment the Treasury philosophy apparently runs like this – the amount of money to be borrowed abroad is arrived at by deducting the estimated tax revenues from the total of projected government expenditure! It ought to run this-a-way – while the GDP remains as small as £28,000 million, government expenditure must be restricted to one-fifth or 20 per cent of GDP and therefore tax revenues cannot exceed £5,600 million per annum!

The Government's immediate and most pressing task is to create the climate and conditions in which the value of the GDP can rise rapidly to at least £56,000 million and to £100,000 million in the 1970s.

Yours faithfully,

Watford, Herts. D. A. TRIGWELL.

The Professional Image

SIR, – Your correspondent, 'Nimrod' (January 11th issue) has done well to bring into the open the state of affairs that is now plaguing this country.

We have been subjected to an ever increasing amount of complex, unintelligible legislation and an ever increasing number of civil servants whose sole pleasure and object seems to be to say 'No' on any and every possible occasion.

'Nimrod' may well be mainly concerned with the tax machinery but I think that the same attitude of mind pervades practically every Government department.

The terrible thing is that the more one sets out to be helpful and to assist with computations, etc., the more the screw is turned on you and points of pure technicality are disputed and argued, without any regard to justice or common sense. I fully agree with 'Nimrod' that it would be better to withdraw our co-operation until there is a change of heart on the part of officialdom. Sad as it may be, there seems no point in being respectable these days.

Yours faithfully,

CERTAC.

Overseas Company Tax Rates

SIR, – We have studied with interest the table which was published about the overseas company tax rates (January 4th issue). We wish, however, to draw your attention to the fact that the Danish company tax rate from the tax-year of 1967–68 has been altered to:

36 per cent	As 50 per cent of taxable income (up to maximum of 2½ per cent of paid-up capital) is deductible, effective rate is lower.
	Non-resident companies 34 per cent.

The percentage has been lowered as 50 per cent of previous year's tax is no longer deductible.

Yours faithfully,

OTTO GULDBERG,

Copenhagen. INTERESSENTSKABET REVISORGRUPPEN.

Quick and Easy Reading

SIR, – I feel that some tribute should be paid to the author, the taxation editor and to the publishers of Capital Allowances and Investment Grants, by M. Storz, which book has recently appeared on the market.

In common with probably all chartered accountants I have ruined my eyesight, not to mention my peace of mind, by having to plough through an unrecalled number of textbooks on those technical subjects which are the misfortune of our profession.

The reason why I am writing this letter is because Mr Storz's book has adopted what I think is a quite novel idea of highlighting the important parts of the statutes relating to its subject-matter by means of printing these parts in heavy type so that by reading only the heavy type the reader can get a very fair idea as to what the subject is about. In fact, the book, which consists of 230 pages of text, can be read in less than three hours in this fashion. I readily acknowledge that such a cursory reading would be disastrous if it was used as the basis for giving professional advice, but it is incontrovertible that to be able to assimilate even the barest skeleton of such a villainous subject as the legislation relating to 'Capital Allowances and Investment Grants' in a mere three hours is almost bordering on the miraculous!

I hope that many of your readers will find a similar benefit should they come to look at the book, and may I through the courtesy of your columns suggest to other publishers that they emulate Butterworths Ltd.

I am, Sir,
Yours faithfully,
Warwick. T. D. KELLY.

OBITUARY

Mr L. Newton Vizard, M.C., F.C.A., of Cheltenham, died on December 31st at the age of 84. Mr Vizard qualified as an incorporated accountant in 1904 and joined his father in partnership.

He served with distinction in the First World War, attaining the rank of Captain in the Machine Gun Corps. He was a well-known local sportsman and prominent Freemason.

Mr W. G. Vincent, a past Chief Clerk of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, died on January 8th. Mr Vincent retired in 1954, aged 65, and lived at Worthing. Apart from military service in the First World War, he was a member of the staff of the Institute for 50 years.

F. M. W. writes: Very few of the present staff or Council of the Institute knew Bill Vincent. As Chief Clerk he was an admirable blend of firmness, kindness, good humour and efficiency in controlling the clerical and housekeeping staff and in supervising the endless administrative duties that fell upon him. In these days of change for the sake of change (called progress) it seems almost unbelievable that Vincent joined the staff of the Institute as a boy in 1904 and, apart from the First World War, served for 50 years until his retirement at 65 in 1954. No one could have been more loyal; no one could have been better liked; no one could have been more conscientious. Those of us who knew him so well are much saddened by his death and our sympathy goes out to his widow, the lively little lady who matched his own vigour.

Use of Templates at Examinations

At its meeting on December 4th, the Council issued the following statement:

'Candidates for the Institute's examinations will in future be permitted to use templates in order to assist them with the preparation of flow-charts and other relevant diagrams.'

COMPANIES (FLOATING CHARGES) (SCOTLAND) ACT 1961

Working Party's Report

The Scottish Law Commission have published a memorandum containing a report by a Working Party set up by the Commission to consider the working of the Companies (Floating Charges) (Scotland) Act 1961 (Memorandum No. 10).

One of the Working Party's principal recommendations is that the holder of a floating charge over the property of a Scottish company should, in certain circumstances, be able to appoint a receiver. This proposal will remove one of the major differences between the laws of Scotland and England in the remedies available to the holder of a floating charge and in the procedure for enforcing the security. Part I of the draft Bill appended to the report contains provisions which are considered necessary to govern the appointment, rights, duties, remuneration and discharge of receivers.

The Working Party also makes recommendations for specific reforms of provisions contained in the Companies Act 1948 and the Companies (Floating Charges) (Scotland) Act 1961. These recommendations form Part II of the draft Bill. They include provisions enabling a company to grant a floating charge over specific assets and in respect of any debt or obligation and provisions relating to ranking and alteration of floating charges.

Certain amendments are also proposed with regard to registration of charges and alterations thereof. In order to avoid duplication of charges registered in England and Scotland, it is proposed that entries in the Scottish register relating to charges created by a Scottish company should satisfy all the requirements of registration under the laws of both countries and the Working Party express the hope that corresponding provisions will be enacted in respect of charges created by an English company.

The Commission have asked for comments on the proposals before February 28th, 1969, and copies of the memorandum can be obtained from the Secretary, Scottish Law Commission, Old College, South Bridge, Edinburgh 8.

THE INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS OF SCOTLAND

Three-week Management Course

The need for many companies to provide training for the young executive with promotion potential in line management provides a constant problem.

To meet this requirement, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland is to hold a three-week residential course entitled 'Management for the young executive' as part of its post-qualifying education programme. The course will be held at The Glenburn Hotel, Rothesay, from November 2nd to 21st.

Designed for those managers between 25 to 35 years of age, the course will be particularly directed to those chartered accountants who wish to bridge the gap between administrative procedures and line management practices, and to accountants and others who, for the first time, are taking on managerial responsibility. The course will comprise three main sections: 'Principles and practice of management', 'Use of resources', and 'Skills of management science'. Participants will be required to consider both the theory and practical implication and inter-functional relationship of the subjects. With this in mind several case studies will be a feature of the course to enable those attending to appreciate the user viewpoint.

The fee for the course is £210 (industrial training boards, it is anticipated, will provide grant aid to cover fees and expenses) and as it is limited to 30 to ensure maximum emphasis and discussion, applications to attend should be made to The Director of Post-qualifying Education at the Institute's Offices, 27 Queen Street, Edinburgh 2, not later than February 15th.

THE CHARTERED ACCOUNTANT STUDENTS' SOCIETY OF LONDON

Future Plans

The annual President's Meeting of the London Chartered Accountant Students' Society in Guildhall on Monday, January 27th, will take the form of a discussion on integration of the profession. The chair will be taken by the President of the Society, Mr G. R. Appleyard, F.C.A., and the proceedings will be opened by the President of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., who will have with him Mr W. E. Parker, C.B.E., F.C.A., a Vice-President of the Society and a Past President of the Institute, and Mr A. H. Walton, M.A., F.C.A., a member of the Council of the Institute and Chairman of the Education Committee.

Others who have agreed to participate are Mr Hugh T. Nicholson, F.C.A., and Mr Bruce Sutherland, F.C.A., and there can be no doubt that this will be one of the most informative meetings that the Society has ever held.

Attendance is limited to student and qualified members of the Society. Tea will be provided at 4 p.m. and the proceedings will start at 5 p.m.

UNION OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANT STUDENTS' SOCIETIES

Change of Name

Under new rules adopted at its conference last month, the Union of Chartered Accountant Students' Societies has, as from January 1st, changed the word 'Union' in its title to 'Association'. This is regarded as being more descriptive. The objects of the Association have also been amended to reflect more clearly its functions.

Other alterations in the rules include changes in the representation of member societies, in the Association's year-end, and in the time of holding the annual conference – the next conference will be held in March 1970. Honorary officers will include a Patron, who is yet to be named, besides those whose appointments were noted in The Accountant of December 28th.

'NO PRICE RISE THROUGH DECIMALIZATION'

Given good planning, a completely trouble-free changeover to decimalization was possible in Britain, said Mr S. L. Moses, former Chairman of the New Zealand Decimal Currency Board, in an interview in the recently published Decimal Currency Board's fifth Newsletter.

Mr Moses, who is in Britain to advise The British Petroleum Co Ltd on its planning for decimalization, declared that the cost of living need not rise as a result of the change to decimal currency.

'The cost of living in New Zealand has gone up. But it has been going up for the last twenty years at roughly 2½ per cent per annum. The consumer price index went up by slightly less for the first two quarters after the change to decimal currency than in the period before. If traders convert their prices fairly and according to the conversion table – as the overwhelming majority did in Australia and New Zealand – then there need be no increase in prices.'

An article taken from the Australia and New Zealand Bank Review underlines many of Mr Moses's points. The importance of good planning is stressed. Retailers who tackled problems positively, trained staff competently and made the changeover a pleasant experience for customers built up goodwill and increased turnover, it says.

Elsewhere, the Newsletter sets out plans for the withdrawal which commences this month, of the half-crown and includes a chart showing how coins will change between now and the time when Britain is fully decimalized.

This is the first Newsletter to be available under the Board's subscription scheme. It may be obtained in minimum quantities of 100 for five consecutive issues, price £5 including postage. Orders should be addressed to HMSO, PO Box 569, London SE1.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED UP-TO-DATE THIRD EDITION

BUSINESS MERGERS AND TAKE-OVER BIDS

by RONALD W. MOON, B.LITT.(OXON.), F.C.A.

ALREADY A BEST SELLER IN GEE'S WORLD MANAGEMENT SERIES

The opportunity has been taken in the third edition of this now well-established book, to introduce new material reflecting the more important changes or landmarks in law and practice which have come into effect during the past eight years. These include an analysis of the provisions of the Monopolies and Mergers Act 1965, the aims and scope of the Industrial Reorganization Corporation, the text of The City Code on Take-overs and Mergers and appropriate extracts from the 1966 Stock Exchange regulations.

Moreover, two entirely new chapters have been introduced. One examines the defensive measures that can be mounted against a bid and gives a short account of the abortive I.C.I. bid for Courtaulds and the long drawn out fight for Telephone Rentals among others. The other new chapter considers the economic and political issues which involve both Government and industry when bids emanate from foreign sources.

All in all, this book gives a penetrating account of the problems – human and financial – which confront the accountant and other financial experts who may be called in to advise on the merits of a merger or the terms of a bid for control.

SILVER MEDALLIST OF THE INSTITUTE OF COST & WORKS ACCOUNTANTS

Distribution is neglected by cost accountants. Costing started in the factory and unfortunately has remained there, in spite of the fact that the expenditure incurred on transferring goods (including marketing and selling them) has increased substantially since costing was invented.

This book is designed to remedy this omission. It is written for students – particularly cost accountancy students – and tells them in an introductory way, how to account for distribution costs and prepare cost accounting statements for distribution managers.

LEDGERS AND ANALYSIS – DECIMALISATION 1971

Are you replacing your accounting equipment for decimalisation in 1971?

CONSIDER INSTEAD
LOWER INVESTMENT, a BETTER SYSTEM and LOWER RUNNING COSTS by using our computer.

We offer a system where one entry of invoices will bring you statements, ledger and analysis. The analysis can be provided in any combination of product, area, representative, cost, budget, etc., and it will agree to the penny or cent with the ledger entries.

The ledger balance is analysed to months overdue and the analysis may appear on the statement, trial balance and in overdue letters to chase outstanding debts quickly.

Over accounting machines you save by:

1. No sorting of invoices to account order.
2. No heading up of ledger cards.
3. No photocopying costs.
4. No bringing forward of balances or trial balance preparation.
5. No selection of ledger cards.
6. Very low stationery costs. Fewer staff. Low investment.

Time is limited before decimalisation but we can take more ledger work from June 1969 and a few accounts can be taken before this date.

A Deed of Gratitude

A legacy for the Methodist Homes for the Aged is a means many generous people adopt in expressing gratitude for their own home and for serenity and peace-of-mind in their old age.

There are so many who are less fortunate and for lonely and anxious old people the Methodist Homes for the Aged are a haven and a home. Our constantly growing income from legacies, more than any other factor, has enabled us to embark on the capital expenditure for twenty-eight Homes. Unfortunately even these will accommodate only a few of the hundreds of deserving people on the tragically long waiting list.

We thankfully acknowledge this valuable assistance and ask you please to remember the Methodist Homes for the Aged when advising your clients.

Record Profits—Merger Progress

Sir Cuthbert B. Clegg, T.D., Chairman, in the course of his Statement circulated with the Report and Accounts for the year ended 31st December, 1968, said:—

Last year I wrote my commentary at a time when we were investigating the desirability of a merger with another bank. After the most careful study it was decided that, subject to certain conditions, such a course would be advantageous. However, the procedure adopted for approaches from individual banks was not completed when the proposed merger with Barclays and Lloyds together was announced. This proposal was referred to the Monopolies Commission which, by a majority of six to four, reported against the scheme. Although this was an insufficient majority to permit an order under the Monopolies and Mergers Act prohibiting the triple merger, it was decided, after discussions with the Government, not to proceed, and an offer from Barclays alone followed immediately thereafter.

Merger

Our reasons for seeking a merger and the subsequent debate on the Monopolies Commission verdict have received sufficient publicity to obviate the need to go over the ground again. Suffice it to say that we were fortunate that Barclays, whose Group has such strength in this country and overseas and whose philosophy of decentralisation closely matches our own, proved to be the purchaser. An overwhelming majority of shareholders voted in favour of the offer and we became a subsidiary of Barclays Bank Limited on 1st November, 1968.

Good Progress

In a year of such turmoil and change it is gratifying to report that our business has continued to make good progress. The number of customers has increased by some 7 per cent and our deposits have risen to a record figure of £537 million, which is £27 million more than a year ago.

The profitable employment of these increased resources has been helped by a higher average Bank Rate, which was £7. 9s. 5d. per cent against £6. 3s. – per cent a year ago, but we have not been able to put as much of them as we would have liked into advances, for we have been subject to increasingly rigorous credit restriction over the whole of the twelve months.

Over the year we have seen a substantial increase in export finance. Our advances and future commitments under the medium-term Export Credits Guarantee Department scheme have increased from £44 million to £56 million. Under this scheme finance is provided at a fixed rate of 5½ per cent, considerably below our present normal lending rates, and this represents a notable contribution to the export effort at the expense of our earning power.

We have played a full part, too, in the provision of finance under the Shipbuilding Industry Board scheme: we are already lending, or are committed to, a total of some £18 million. Again, this finance is at the same advantageous rate to the borrower of 5½ per cent fixed, and we, in common with all the Clearing Banks, have agreed in principle to increase our support now that the Government has lifted to £400 million the powers of guarantee given to the Ministry of Technology by the Shipbuilding Industry Act.

Our liquidity ratio stands at 32.9 per cent, against the required minimum of 28 per cent, and this should see us through the period of strain over the next few months. This year, in addition to the normal seasonal outflow, we have to take into account the effect of the new scheme of prior deposits for imports. It is difficult to predict how much will be drawn from the private sector by this scheme, but our customers may have to find some £30 million for this purpose.

Profits

The group profit for the year, after transfers to inner reserves, was £3,560,796 compared with £2,876,927 a year ago. This higher figure arises from both an increase in our assets and an overall improvement in rates, as mentioned earlier.

A sum of £2 million has been transferred to the bank's Reserve Fund.

We paid an interim dividend of 7½ per cent on 31st July, 1968, and by agreement with Barclays Bank Limited no final dividend will be paid, in view of the comparatively short period of trading since the date on which we became a wholly-owned subsidiary.

In November we were pleased to welcome Mr. W. G. Bryan, T.D., and Mr. A. L. Grant, T.D., D.L., a Vice-Chairman and a Director respectively of Barclays Bank.

Expansion

The Trust Company which, as mentioned in my last commentary, commenced business on 1st January, 1968, embarked on a programme of consolidation of the various activities taken over from certain departments of the bank. It was decided that the company's financial year should terminate on 30th September and the results for the first nine-month operating period have been very satisfactory. A profit of £115,986 was made in this period after tax and before payment of a dividend of 4½ per cent to the parent company.

During 1968 there has been steady expansion in all the Trust Company's various Divisions. The activities of the Trustee Division have been extended to include a comprehensive estate planning service and the Taxation Division has made good progress. Through the Investment Division, set up at the start of the year, the investment activities of the Company have been enlarged and the management and advisory services further developed.

During the year the Grasshopper Property Trust for charities and pension funds was established and attracted substantial funds; the standing of the participants and the high calibre of the Management Committee augur well for its future progress.

Unit Trust sales through Martins Unicorn continued to expand, both by sales over the bank's counters and a substantial programme of block offers; our investment here has amply justified our original decision to take over a well established Group in this field.

MARTINS BANK LIMITED CHAIRMAN'S STATEMENT CONTD.

The Finance Company has continued its primary function of accepting large deposits of sterling at special rates for fixed periods. Its ability to lend to customers by way of medium-term loan was limited by credit restriction and monies not so lent were placed with Martins Bank Limited or on the inter-bank market. The Company has played its part in the introduction of the new Negotiable Sterling Certificates of Deposit and has also been active in the Euro-Currency markets. In the year to 31st October last it earned a profit of £87,933, after tax, and declared a dividend of 10 per cent.

From our highly satisfactory investment in the equity of Mercantile Credit Company Limited we have received a dividend of 22½ per cent compared with 20 per cent last year.

During 1968 we opened twelve new branches and nine replacement branches and effected major alterations at twenty-two branches. In addition, we continued the installation of counter screens to protect the staff from bandit attacks.

Our automation programme has gone forward very satisfactorily with all target dates met. We now have some forty branches on computer operation and further branches will be added this year.

So far we have not felt any great impact from the National Giro, but we are keenly alive to this prospective competition.

Commencing in July, 1969, the banks will be closed on Saturdays. Much as we regret any reduction in the service offered to customers, the decision was forced upon us by pressures which we could no longer contain. The proposed new weekday opening hours are 9.30 a.m. to 3.30 p.m. from Monday to Friday with late opening from 4.30 to 6 p.m. on one evening of the week, the choice of day for evening opening to be subject to local requirements. In their finally agreed form these extended hours should help to mitigate any inconvenience to customers, and we are joining with Barclays in an extensive programme to provide further cash dispensers and more night safe facilities.

Strengthening the Pound

In the national and international sphere, we can look back only upon another year of economic tribulation. The hoped-for benefits of devaluation have been slow to emerge and the recuperation of the pound has been set back by tardy action to restrain home demand and by lack of confidence in the successful outcome of the efforts we are making to overcome our difficulties. However, progress has been made in the strengthening of sterling through the negotiations for the establishment of Special Drawing Rights, the enlargement of central bank swap facilities and the Basle agreements of last September. Some good may come even from the exchange crisis of November if it hastens a more critical review of the whole international monetary system.

Quite apart from the level of Government expenditure, however, is the method of its financing. Unless expenditure is met from taxation or genuine savings, it has to come from the creation of new money and this must have an inflationary effect unless domestic output is rising steeply.

It is vital to re-establish confidence in our ability to keep inflation in check. A significant feature of the present economic scene is the loss of confidence by the great mass of the people in the value of money and hence of saving through investment in fixed interest government securities. This is a major cause of the difficulty experienced in the control of consumption.

The Barclays Bank Bill

But to return to our domestic affairs, there is now before Parliament a bill entitled "The Barclays Bank Bill", which, when enacted, will transfer the whole undertaking of Martins Bank to Barclays Bank as from an appointed day, which will be not later than 1st January, 1970. A great deal of paperwork and expense in making transfers to Barclays will thus be saved. It will involve the dissolution of Martins Bank but the right to use the name will be retained and in this way integration of the two banks will become a reality.

Every effort is being made to integrate as quickly as possible because it is only in this way that the full advantages of the merger can be obtained. We can assure our customers, however, that everything possible will be done to maintain the happy personal relationships which have been established in many cases over very long periods.

St Michael-from-all-Angles

WE are writing, not about the archangel, but the archretailer – Marks & Spencer. The excuse is provided by the recently published history of the company written by Goronwy Rees.[1] And we offer no apology for choosing what may seem to be an irrelevant (though not irreverent) subject for these pages, for we believe that the manifest success of M. & S. must have some message for accountants.

The story of Marks & Spencer is not the typical one of two men who start from nothing (though this was true of the original Michael Marks who arrived from Poland about 1882 at the age of 19), sweat themselves, their associates and their customers for years, and finally establish their right to lecture the rest of the world on how toughness, determination and single-minded devotion to the business have led to success. Of course, all these qualities have been shown in the history of M. & S.; but none of them go very far towards explaining why it is that the company has become part of the English scene and a fine example of what is best in British business. In fact the roots of the business were quickly established and moderate success was achieved after a very few years. Phenomenal success, on the other hand, can be traced to the early establishment and implementation of a few principles, which have never been changed, but which are still not universally accepted. Since accountants, wherever they work, must be interested in what makes corporate activity succeed, it is worth looking at these principles.

There is, first, the very fact that principles were established at all. This is called 'corporate planning' these days and it is thought – quite correctly – to be the necessary prerequisite to any effective management, including the preparation and use of budgetary control. But in the case of Michael Marks it was just a case of defining the market he was trying to satisfy and how he was going to do it. His was deliberately a working-class market and he was going to give it the goods it wanted, at the price it could afford. This was the basis of the Penny Bazaar, which in turn became the basis of the famous 5*s* variety chain stores of the inter-war years. It is still the basis of the great chain of stores which sell on quality and value for money in increasing amounts each year. So it looks as though the establishment of clear business objectives earns dividends. Do all the businesses we serve do this?

There were other essential ingredients to the success story; and the most important of these was an all-pervading concern for people. This led to profit and brought contentment to the founder, his two illustrious successors, Lords Marks and Sieff, and the rest of the management – past and present. Theirs was a genuine humanity, believed in, lived and put to practical use in dealings with customers, suppliers and staff.

[1] St Michael – a history of Marks & Spencer, Goronwy Rees, published by Weidenfeld & Nicolson, price 50*s*.

Lord Sieff once said of Lord Marks and himself, 'we both felt that making people happy was the great thing in life'. This idea was not only translated into terms of employee welfare – which is commonly done in the interests of creating a smooth-running business – but also into millions of customers who positively enjoy shopping at M. & S., and into hundreds of suppliers who are efficient, content and profitable because they trade with M. & S. Now accountants are not commonly thought of as people who make other people happy: perhaps they should look at themselves and consider whether they encourage enough humanity to develop around them. After all, most of us spend a large part of life at work, and there is no point in not enjoying it if we can.

It is also worth speculating at this moment of time what might happen to industrial relations if the M. & S. principle of putting people first were more commonly applied: some of the current 'castle-building' might not then be needed!

The next aspect of the St Michael story which is directly relevant is the insistence of the mighty Simon Marks – and he is the real giant in the fairy story – on the need for business to be simple if it is to be successful. He liked things simple himself; he believed that the basic business proposition to the customer must be simple; because he believed that everyone concerned with putting it into operation had to understand it, it had to be simple; and he believed that the methods used in execution had also to be simple.

Many accountants probably know more about Lord Marks' celebrated assault on over-elaborate paperwork, called 'Operation simplification', than they do about any other detailed aspect of the M. & S. story (see The Accountant, March 14th, 1959, 'Simplification for efficiency' by M. J. Glenn). This was not an isolated attack on over-elaboration as part of a drive to reduce overheads: it was a piece of the basic philosophy of the business.

By all means have forms and figures – Thomas Spencer was an excellent book-keeper with an ability for figures, and he was taken into the original partnership largely to get the administrative part of the business into proper order so that Michael Marks could get on with the job of finding more outlets and more customers. But Lord Marks had an instinctive mistrust of bureaucracy and out went 26 million pieces of paper a year. This was all very dramatic but it is only one aspect of the application of simplicity to business. Are we sure that the clients and employers of accountants think of them as making business more simple?

Probably the most startling innovation made by M. & S. during the company's life has been their positive co-operation with their suppliers. This started very early on. Certainly by the time the company went public in 1926 the idea that goods of the quality and in the quantity required to supply a chain of stores could only be obtained by establishing a form of collaboration between the producer and the retailer was being put into practice. Since then it has developed to the stage at which M. & S. offer their suppliers a wide range of consultancy services, taking in production engineering, labour management, and the maintenance of technical standards.

It was early recognized that M. & S. could not be merely a passive recipient of what manufacturers had to offer. Yet the sort of collaboration that M. & S. have practised for many years has not often been imitated. Too few businessmen even now would agree with Goronwy Rees that the manufacturer, the retailer and the consumer are parts of a single and continuous economic process in which each has a common interest. Accountants will have no difficulty in identifying the inefficiencies and high costs that come from ignoring this fact, through short production runs, tooling and tool changes, inflated inventories, proliferation of styles and models, uneven production flow, and so on. Perhaps they can do something to persuade British business to look seriously at the opportunities offered by positive co-operation between manufacturer and distributor. Dare one opine that this could be a much more fruitful field of study than inquiries by the Prices and Incomes Board into retail margins and the hounding of manufacturers on monopoly practices and the maintenance of resale prices?

Speaking in the House of Lords in 1961 Lord Marks said 'Just as all firms need accountants . . .'. He was right once again and there is a fair amount of evidence from the pressure being exerted on the profession at the present time that more and more people are coming to agree with him. At the same time there are a number of factors which seem to have contributed to the great success of M. & S. which ought to be part of the normal equipment of the accountant but often seem not to be.

It could be that the examinations of the accountancy bodies should give more attention to the fashionable behavioural sciences; or they might merely include a question on what makes business tick. But in any event all accountants should get some pay-off from a study of the life and times of St Michael – within – the – High Street.

New Era in Industrial Relations?

EVEN in the most perfect of industrial societies, disputes between labour and management would be inevitable. Nevertheless, in recent years, while the number of official strikes has not shown any consistent tendency to grow, in contrast, the number of unofficial strikes has risen steadily. The average annual number of stoppages in the period 1964–67 was 2,253, of which 2,125 were unofficial. Of the 751,800 workers directly involved, 663,300 were involved in unofficial strikes and these also accounted for 1·9 million of the 2·5 million working days lost each year.

Public opinion has undergone a marked change in recent years in its views upon labour disputes. According to the public opinion polls a considerable majority of people, including trade unionists themselves, are now anxious that the Government should intervene to prevent the losses which such strikes entail, both for the private individual and for the national economy. It is common knowledge that the Parliamentary Opposition has already formulated plans to counter the growth in labour disputes – particularly the unofficial strike – and in the circumstances the timing of the Government's White Paper, In Place of Strife, Cmnd 3888 (H.M.S.O. 3*s* 6*d*) is not surprising.

The White Paper has attracted conflicting opinions. For some, in particular employers, it does not go far enough. As far as the trade unions are concerned, however, it represents an interference in those matters conventionally left to the mutual dealing of employer and employee. The two major proposals are the setting up of the new Commission on Industrial Relations, proposed by the Donovan Commission, and the imposition of the 28-day 'conciliation period', or, what the Americans have termed the 'cooling off period'.

The function of the new Commission will be to adjudicate in disputes such as the inter-union quarrel in the steel industry, or the more recent dispute at the Girling company's works. It would be valuable, too, if the Commission were to be made responsible for reviewing what the White Paper tactfully describes as 'customs and practices which restrict the effective use of resources, including manpower – for example, over-manning or unnecessary overtime.'

The basis of the conciliation pause is that the Minister would be able to compel workers to remain at their jobs while the dispute was properly investigated. Failure to abide by his request would involve fines, but it would only be used where the normal conciliation methods had first been tried. The White Paper takes the view that the existence of this power will encourage trade unions to intensify their efforts to see that procedures are observed by their members. This may well be true, since far too many unofficial strikes stem from the lack of contact between the workers on the factory floor and their official trade union representatives.

Two of the proposed White Paper innovations are of especial interest to accountants and management. It is suggested that a provision shall be included in the Industrial Relations Bill to enable trades unions to obtain from employers certain sorts of information that are needed for negotiations. The precise content of this clause is to be left to 'detailed consultations' which will give 'full consideration to the safeguards needed to protect firms' commercial interests.'

The other proposal is for workers' representatives to be appointed to the boards of undertakings. The White Paper notes that the Government favours experiments in this method, and consultations on how this may be facilitated will be held. The complexities of this proposal are legion; among the more obvious points to be considered is whether the union representatives will be prepared to accept joint responsibility for the consequences of a board's decisions. If, on the other hand, it is argued that the sole purpose of membership is to ensure that the workers are apprised of the board's intentions in all matters affecting them, then one must ask why the board cannot be trusted to ensure that this is done without such representation. Clearly, this point cannot be resolved without consideration – in the widest context of company law – of the nature of director, shareholder and worker interests.

The general consensus of informed liberal opinion on the White Paper seems to be that the powers in the future Industrial Relations Act may not be sufficient to bring about the improvements in labour relations that the economy requires. On the other hand, what is significant is that the Government at last recognizes that labour relations cannot be left entirely to trades unions and employers. If the worst fears expressed by some trades unionists of Government dictatorship are to be avoided, the trades unions themselves must take a more realistic view of their obligations to society and the economy than emerged from their evidence to the Donovan Commission.

Leasehold Muddle

IT is a truism of the property market that, other things being equal, a lessee will pay more for the freehold than would a third party who is buying merely for investment. Besides saving himself the expense of the rent, the lessee is also freeing himself from the restrictions imposed by the lease and from the uncertainty of what might happen to the freehold otherwise.

This truism was presumably known to the Government and its advisers when it drew up the Leasehold Reform Act 1967, which gives to the lessees of low-rated houses the right to purchase the freehold on specially advantageous terms. These involve the ascertainment of an open market value. However, nowhere does the Act give any indication of whether, in arriving at that market value, the lessee himself is to be brought into account as a potential buyer.

The question arose in the case of H. Custins v. Hearts of Oak Benefit Society, the hearing of which before the Lands Tribunal lasted four days last November. The reasoned judgment of the Tribunal was given last week and on this particular point it is in favour of the landlord. The relevant words, contained in section 9 (1), are 'if sold in the open market by a willing seller'.

Apart from the question of actual valuation, the object of the Act was to enable the lessee to force his landlord to sell. In the case of a large estate it is, of course, extremely inconvenient to be deprived of little pockets of freeholds here and there. It was, therefore, natural to insert the words 'willing seller' in section 9 (1) in order to prevent the valuer from assuming a reluctant landlord. It was considered not necessary to say 'willing buyer' in section 9 (1) because the whole background of the Act was the willing and even anxious tenant who was unable to buy.

In section 9 (2), in another connection 'willing buyer' does appear.

The tenant in the present case tried to persuade the Tribunal to assume that he himself was not going to be a bidder. His argument had some support from other provisions in section 9 (1), namely, the imposition of an assumption that the lease was to be extended (at a modern ground-rent) for a further fifty years. What, asked the tenant, was the point of such an assumption in relation to a purchase of the freehold by the tenant himself?

The Tribunal decided against him, however, on the ground that if Parliament had wanted to exclude the one person who was usually the one more likely to buy, then it would have said so. Moreover, section 1 of the Act does require 'fair terms' and it would be unfair to deprive the landlord of that advantage in addition to his other losses under the Act.

Oddly enough, the chartered surveyors on each side independently arrived at practically the same value of a modern ground-rent for the site. Indeed, in so far as there was any difference, it was the tenant's witness who arrived at the higher figure, namely £100 per annum against the landlord's witness of £99 per annum. Again, the present market value of the actual ground-rent was valued at £86 by the tenant's witness and at £78 by the landlord's witness.

Notwithstanding their agreement about the modern rental value, the two witnesses diverged considerably on the question of the present actual capital value, of the site; the landlord's witness taking £1,650 and the tenant's witness £1,250. The Tribunal held that £1,300 was the right figure. Assuming this figure of £1,300 was correct, the landlord's witness arrived at a present discounted value of £452, discounting for the remaining 30½ years of the existing lease at 6 per cent less tax. The tenant's witness discounted at 4 per cent (without any deduction for tax) and this produced £393.

The position immediately before the Tribunal's decision was as follows:

	Landlord	Tenant
Original valuation of discounted value of the reversion	£ 574	£ 120
Present capital value of existing £6 6*s* ground-rent (X)	78	86
Total payable to landlord	£652	£206
Adjusted valuation of discounted value of reversion	£ 452	£ 393
X as before	78	86
Total payable to landlord	£530	£479

The Tribunal finally held that the proper total amount for the tenant to pay the landlord was £500 – nearly two and a half times as much as the tenant originally offered. The Tribunal did not put forward its own computation. However, the fact that it was about half-way between the last two computations is of considerable significance. It seems that neither side is proposing to appeal against the decision.

Although the tenant appears to have gained little, it would appear from other evidence given to the Tribunal that the mere passing of the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 had already increased the value of his leasehold from £3,500 to £4,500.

Personal Wealth in Britain

PUBLISHED information relating to personal wealth and its distribution in the UK has been for many years seriously lacking. Data relating to incomes have been substantially increased due to the growth in the number of persons chargeable to income tax. The resultant figures are the by-product of the taxation process. It will have been noted that, since the introduction of the capital gains tax, information is now required from taxpayers relating to the acquisition of assets, but it will be many years before this method provides comprehensive data relating to the total wealth of the population.

The method used by researchers in the past to estimate total personal wealth and its distribution has been based upon the estate duty statistics. In the last few years the Board of Inland Revenue has published in its annual report estimates of personal wealth by reference to the size of holdings and the type of assets held. The annual figures for the three-year period 1964–66 are now reproduced in the latest issue of the Annual Abstract of Statistics 1968 (HMSO, price 35*s*), and seem to have attached rather more attention than on the occasion of their original publication.

Total net wealth in Great Britain, which is divided in effect between nearly 18 million households, amounts to £76,700 million, of which the largest single type of asset is net landed property valued at £18,700 million. The next largest class of assets is total quoted shares and debentures totalling some £12,200 million, followed by insurance policies with a total value of £11,400 million. Unquoted shares and debentures totalled £3,200 million – a sum substantially exceeded by money and deposits in building societies at almost £5,000 million.

The distribution of this personal wealth is striking. There are some 14,600 million households with assets not exceeding £5,000 and almost half of these households have less than £1,000. There are, however, nearly 3,300 million households with assets over £5,000 and, in the aggregate, they own £52,300 million. Of that number, however, more than half, i.e., 1,900 million, owned only £13,600 million. There were 44,000 cases in the range of £100,000 and over. They owned, in total, £9,000 million.

Quite apart from the economic and social implications of these estimates, and it needs to be borne in mind that they are only estimates which are subject to wide margin of error in the highest values of estates, there is little doubt that many MPs will use them as the basis for a demand for a net wealth tax.

Two More Computers for the Revenue

TWO 1904F computers have been ordered for the Inland Revenue Computer Centres 2 and 3, making a further stage under which the Revenue is transferring to nine centres its PAYE work.

Centre 1 at East Kilbride (as announced in our issue of November 23rd) is already working on PAYE in Scotland. Centre 2, which will be sited at Bootle, will take delivery of its computer in December 1970, and Centre 3 will be at Llanishen, near Cardiff, and will receive its computer in the following December.

The Bootle computer centre will handle all the PAYE affairs for the North-west of England, while similar work for Wales, Monmouth, and all the public departments in the United Kingdom will be done at the Llanishen centre.

The two computers will carry out most of the routine arithmetical work relating to PAYE now dealt with by a number of local tax offices. Between them, they will handle the tax affairs of nearly six million taxpayers.

Certified Accountants' New Publication

FIRST in a series of decimal currency booklets[1] to be published by The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants during the period from now until D-day on February 15th, 1971, is concerned with contracts spanning D-day, because many organizations will be concerned with contracts that will not be completed until after that date. The purpose of the whole series is to create discussion and thought on the subject of decimalization so that when D-day arrives businesses will be prepared and normal activity will not be interrupted.

The Association are to be complimented on this, the first publication by a professional accountancy body on the subject of decimalization. They are frank enough to admit that in the light of later legislation, there may well be minor details to be revised and that to many problems a single solution will not be possible. It may be hoped that new editions of each booklet in the series will be available closer to D-day containing such revisions and attempting more specific guidance on the problems envisaged.

In eight pages of print and five schedules of comparative values in the present booklet, the reader is given a valuable insight into the practical workings of the decimal currency transition period. Not that the booklet is restricted to the precise subject-matter of its title; those to whom long-term contracts are of minimal interest will find useful background knowledge and an excellent set of reference tables.

Priced at 4*s* (or 20*p*), the publication unfortunately suffers from the same dull cover format as other Association booklets, and the opportunity to give a distinctive appearance to a series of such wide interest has been lost. One other criticism must be made: in the schedules, the symbols +, = and — are used to indicate loss or gain on conversion, without clearly indicating who is gaining or losing; while in the table of percentage differences the use of colour or of brackets could have shown clearly which were losses or gains, without taxing the eyesight and intelligence of the reader.

UK Executive Salaries in 1968

WHATEVER may have been the effectiveness of the National Board for Prices and Incomes in keeping down during 1968 the pace of increases in manual workers' incomes, the salaries of senior executives certainly do not appear to have experienced any such restraints. Such a conclusion is inevitable from a study of the results obtained from a survey covering 251 companies and nearly 2,500 executives undertaken by Associated Industrial Consultants.

Of the 1968 sample, 11 per cent of the respondents were earning under £2,000 per annum, compared with almost double that proportion in 1967. The proportion of the sample earning over £4,000 rose from 25 to 35 per cent in the same period. Some indication of the average rate of increase in salaries is provided by the change in the median salaries for various groups of executives between the two years. In particular, chief accountants' median salaries were 43 per cent up, and cost accountants' 42 per cent higher.

It is noteworthy that the largest increase in the median salaries over the four-year period 1964–68 have been gained by chief accountants, marketing managers and data processing managers. Last year, 24 per cent of the chief accountants covered in the survey were earning over £5,000, compared with 19 per cent in 1967. Bonuses are a relatively unimportant method of remunerating senior executives but where they are paid in some two-thirds of the cases the bonus was related to profits, and in the balance of cases to turnover.

According to the survey, the larger the company, the larger are the salaries paid to general and sales managers, chief accountants, engineers and company secretaries. In the case of the latter profession, 1968 witnessed very substantial increases for, according to the survey report, 'the increasing number of mergers is evidently creating a demand for a recognition of skilled company secretaries in spite of the inevitable casualty rate among them'.

Except at the very top level of companies, salaries in the West Midlands tend to be as high, if not higher, than in the south-east region including London. The survey also comments on the high salaries paid in the chemicals industry and concludes that this is to be expected in view of the heavy preponderance of American-owned companies.

The Accountant Annual Awards for 1969

COMPANIES are reminded that they still have until January 31st to submit their reports and accounts presented at annual meetings held in 1968 for consideration for The Accountant Annual Awards to be made this year – the sixteenth year of the Awards.

Entries should be addressed to The Secretary, The Accountant Annual Awards, 151 Strand, London WC2. The only qualifying condition is that companies' shares are quoted on a recognized Stock Exchange in the United Kingdom.

The Awards were instituted in 1954 to encourage the preparation by public companies of clearer and more informative annual reports and accounts. Two Awards are made each year – one to large companies and the other to 'smaller' companies requiring less complex accounts than those of a large group.

Overcoming the Shortage of Systems Analysts

ALL expansionist schemes have in their wake a consequent staff problem. The computer industry is no exception as at the present rate of development it is estimated that there will be a shortage of 15,000 systems analysts by 1970.

For the guidance of all who are concerned with their training, and in an endeavour to overcome this shortage, the Department of Employment and Productivity has published a booklet, The Training of Systems Analysts (Commercial), (HMSO, price 5*s*). It has a preface by the Rt Hon. Frank Cousins, Chairman of the Central Training Board, who believes that the publication 'will be of value to a wide range of commercial, industrial and educational establishments in co-ordinating the requirements of individual training boards and in setting national standards for key personnel in computer services'.

The recommended training has a three-fold aspect, comprising business training and computer training as well as system analysis training. Embraced in each of these three stages is 'off-the-job-training' and 'on-the-job-training and experience', and these are diagrammatically illustrated in Part V and the appendices of the booklet.

The objectives of the business training are to give the trainee an understanding of the purpose and interrelationship of the main functions within an organization and the problems of introducing computer-based

A Deputy Secretary for the Institute

JOHN PATRICK HOUGH, F.C.A., is to become Deputy Secretary of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales on March 1st. After an eighteen months' search for the right man, the Council found Hough (pronounced 'Hoff') in the City firm of Robson, Morrow & Co. In his career he has been closely concerned with computers and modern management techniques.

Apart from the obvious advantage of having someone with John Hough's accomplishments and forward outlook to pilot the Institute – as undoubtedly, if all goes to plan, he will – in the seventies and eighties, the choice is a fortunate one, for Hough's experience in the profession has ranged over virtually the whole spectrum of professional work and activity. He is therefore well fitted to appreciate the problems – many peculiar to their particular field – which can arise.

Now aged 40, married, with five children from 11 downwards, John Hough had a grammar school education and gained the Higher School Certificate in – not surprisingly – pure and applied maths, physics and chemistry.

After National Service in the Royal Navy, working on radar, he was articled in 1953 to a sole practitioner, Mr M. R. Cobbett, F.C.A., of Portsmouth. Passing his Final in November 1953, he was admitted to membership of the Institute in 1954. He had a brief spell in the London office of Derbyshire & Co, Chartered Accountants, before joining Turquand Youngs & Co in the City later in 1954.

It was while he was with Turquand Youngs that Hough became increasingly interested in computers and their potential, particularly for accounting applications, and with two colleagues he founded the London Computer Group. Formed in April 1956, it says much for the energy and enthusiasm of John Hough and his collaborators that The Accountant of July 7th that year, recording the holding of the Group's first convention, was able to report 'an expanding membership now past the 250 mark, brought together by personal contact'.

At the convention Hough was appointed joint honorary secretary of the Group. A year later the Group was reformed as the British Computer Society, with Hough as secretary and later as treasurer. He is currently a Fellow of the Society.

In 1957 he moved into the industrial field by joining IBM (United Kingdom) Ltd. As an EDP methods representative, providing technical support to the sales force in business applications of computers, he obtained sound experience in programming and in systems analysis and design. He re-entered professional practice in 1961 with Robson, Morrow & Co, as a consultant, and was made a partner in 1962.

John Hough is not unacquainted with Institute corporate activity. From 1963 he played a significant role in the development of the Institute's EDP course and in 1966–67 was chairman of the working party responsible for running the courses. Since 1967 he has been a member of the Research Committee.

Off duty, John is very much a family man. 'I have little of what can be called spare time', he says; 'my family don't see much of me during the week, so at the week-end I usually do what the children want'. He plays a little tennis, likes music. He is interested in current affairs, in particular – not unnaturally – education; and in politics, though not, he hastens to add, 'as a partisan'. But he is a member of the Bow Group and was co-author of the Bow pamphlet, Computers in Britain. He has also found time during the last two years to be a Visiting Lecturer at Manchester Business School.

systems to industrial concerns. Knowledge of the computer itself, its structure and the content of programs, the preparation and collection of data, and the organization of computing and data processing departments, is assimilated in the second stage of training. The third and final stage is the acquisition of job skills and knowledge additional to those dealt with in the first two stages, but which are essential to the analyst in order that he may cope with his first post of responsibility in a satisfactory manner.

It is emphasized in the booklet that the responsibility of training and directing the work of systems analysts, and the selection of the systems which are to be implemented, lies with senior management.

'He is your President, too'

WITH these words a British politician recently summed up in a Press article the idea that has been engaging the attention of public men and industrialists in Britain for some years. The industry of the United Kingdom – and, indeed, of Europe west of the Elbe – is so bound up with the politics of the United States of America, that the installation last Monday of Richard Nixon as the 37th President of the USA, must cause some palpitation on this side of the Atlantic.

What does it portend? To answer this question at all it is necessary to remember the great extent of, but

A Matter of Fees

by An Industrious Accountant

AFTER the lecture we adjourned to the bar in an atmosphere of noisy relief, because with all respect to the average lecturers nowadays they tend to prefer duration to quality. I found myself beside a spare little chap with a clipped moustache and an indignant expression.

It's all very well for you chaps in industry to be so smug, he grumbled unjustifiably, since had he but known it, most of us feel insecurity always peering ominously behind our shoulders. His face emerged from his tankard and he started off on a shriller note. Life in public practice, he said, was hell – just sheer hell. It was a wonder that half the bally practising accountants didn't go right round the bend.

He dealt with small clients mostly, he explained. Their accounts were elementary enough, in the majority of cases, but often their dumb proprietors hadn't the wit to close off the ledger entries, let alone to prepare an accurate trial balance or balance sheet. His own staff had to write up the books before they could commence the audit proper. That wasn't work worthy of auditors.

I said innocently enough that presumably he then charged a higher fee in such cases and his face went scarlet. Higher fee? he snorted. They won't pay higher fees! If he received 90 quid for a week's work he was lucky, and at that he was the last creditor. Sometimes the so-and-sos let it run till the next year! Try paying rising office overheads out of that, let alone attractive salaries to staff!

Nowadays clients don't really want audited accounts, he said morosely, starting on another tankard. All the skinflints want is someone who'll fix the tax liability and if he can fiddle it, so much the better. I made sympathetic but vague noises, as a safety measure, but he jabbed a violent finger in my chest to emphasize his next point.

He couldn't increase his fees; if he did his clients would leave him. Chaps in industry just didn't appreciate the stark undiluted hell of the auditor. There were unscrupulous shysters in this very town who went around soliciting audits for cut fees. Why, he'd had a grocer on his books for years and last week this shyster went to that very grocer offering to cut a tenner off the fee, just to get the audit. It was scandalous, a rank disgrace. Why didn't the Institute ever do something to help its harassed smaller members? What about registration rather than all this premature integration nonsense?

Those sharks are smart enough on the tricky tax angles, too, he went on, smacking his lips over a fresh drink. He could name names if he wanted, but better not here. There was a smooth-spoken chap in the income tax department of that bank (no names, no pack drill), as well as that fellow who taught in the commercial college, to start with. Where did they get their big cars? By part-time work, by moonlighting, by price-cutting on the high-principled auditors who weren't even allowed to advertise – that's where! Working in their comfortable homes, without declaring their iniquitous extra income to the Revenue.

He'd raise his fees, this year, he said, with sudden truculence. He'd shake off those miserable huckstering clients, concentrate on worth-while accounts, pay respectable salaries to his staff, make a fight for it. He'd probably end up in the bankruptcy court, he concluded, sitting down limply, but he wouldn't lower the flag while he lasted.

Adam Smith wrote in The Wealth of Nations – 'People of the same trade seldom meet together even for merriment or diversion, but the conversation ends in a conspiracy against the public or in some contrivance to raise prices'. Maybe, but not this time; not in the case of some accountants in practice.

also the narrow limitations on, the President's powers. He is elected for four years. One President may now only serve for two terms, though one (Franklin D. Roosevelt) in exceptional circumstances served three. The President may not introduce legislation in Congress. He may recommend it and may veto a measure, but it may be reintroduced. He may open up new diplomatic contacts and recommend new initiatives in foreign affairs but may not declare war or make peace. The commitments he may appear to make in foreign affairs may be nullified by a vote of the Senate; his steps are marked out for him in this field by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate.

He is the mightiest man on earth yet so small that he may be impeached. His words descend like the commands of Zeus from Olympus; yet when his term is finished, he will return meekly to his native town like any other public man and resume his role of Mr Citizen. He can move armies and fleets to the uttermost ends of the earth but is, although commander-in-chief, watched by Congress and is powerless without their support. In the end, he must give an account of his stewardship and whilst, in his State of the Union message, he may tell Congress what he thinks the occasion demands, he can only resign if that body remains inactive.

He expects that the whole world knows the limitations to his power. Woe betide the nations which presume too much. To the American, still endowed with the frontier state mentality, the President is there to defend the constitution against all comers. This is a written document which may be interpreted by the Supreme Court. It behoves every British politician and industrialist to know its content; Fort Joseph, the hydro-electric contract, should be in his history book. To the American the constitution though not immutable is, in a strange way, regarded as unalterable; and it is the President's duty to be its caretaker.

The British businessman should know that although his own country's is unwritten, the constitution of the United States exists in adamantine form; and that, though not his own, it is vicariously a document that informs – or should inform – his every calculation. If he is deceived then the President, with all the citizens behind him, would say that he is the sucker; he should have 'knowed'.

The Three-year Surplus

by W. S. ATKINSON, A.C.A., F.T.I.I.

'THIS clause is a helpful clause,' said the Chief Secretary of the three-year surplus rules during the committee stage of the debate on the 1965 Finance Bill. In fact, the clause was far more helpful than the Chief Secretary thought it was. It contained large and alluring loopholes for company groups and in the 1966 and 1968 Finance Acts the Chancellor revoked more than a little of his generosity.

The helpfulness now seems more apparent than real and it will be interesting to see whether, in practice, many companies benefit from the three-year surplus provisions.

These provisions are tortuously expressed, often appearing to defy comprehension; they involve laborious calculations and offer limited scope for tax planning. They are contained in section 85 of the Finance Act 1965, section 28 and Schedule 7 of the Finance Act 1966, and sections 25 and 26 of the Finance Act 1968. The intention of this article is to explain the following aspects of the three-year surplus:

(1) Its background and purpose.

(2) The machinery of relief.

(3) The calculation of relief.

(4) The special provisions concerning groups.

(5) Other salient features.

Background and purpose

The essential feature of the three-year surplus is that it is a transitional relieving provision. Before the introduction of corporation tax, companies which paid dividends did not have to account to the Revenue for the tax deducted at source, since the dividends were treated as paid out of profits which had already borne income tax. With effect from April 6th, 1966, however, UK resident companies are required to account to the Revenue under Schedule F for income tax deducted at source from their distributions.

Clearly inequity arises if a company pays dividends after April 5th, 1966, which exceed its income arising after that date; part of the dividends must have come from earlier profits which have already borne income tax, and yet income tax on the whole of the dividends has to be paid over to the Revenue. The purpose of the three-year surplus rules is to give relief in this situation.

The following example will make this clear:

	Years to December 31st
	1964	1965
Profit	100	100
Income tax	(41)
Profits tax	(15)
Corporation tax		(40)
Profits available for distribution	£44	£60 = £104

Schedule F tax payable if:

(a) £44 is distributed before April 5th, 1966, and £60 after April 5th, 1966: £60 × 8*s* 3*d* = £25.

(b) Both £44 and £60 distributed after April 5th, 1966: £104 × 8*s* 3*d* = £43.

The three-year surplus rules are designed to give relief for this inequity.

Machinery of relief

To understand how the relief operates it is necessary to consider, first, the rules governing the accounting for tax deducted from franked investment income (FII) under section 48, Finance Act 1965. By these rules, a UK resident company must pay the Revenue under Schedule F the tax deducted from its distributions. However, it can obtain credit for the tax deducted at Source from FII received, thereby reducing the Schedule F tax payable to the Revenue. Apart from claiming a set-off under the shortfall rules, this is the only way in which a company can obtain relief for the tax suffered on its FII.

If the tax suffered exceeds the Schedule F liability, the FII referable to that excess is carried forward as a surplus of FII, tax on which can be used to set off against a Schedule F liability in the following years.

The three-year surplus relief operates by allowing a notional surplus of FII to be carried forward from 1965–66 for the purposes of section 48. Thus the surplus is initially treated as FII received in 1966–67 (section 48 (2)), and income tax calculated on this notional sum can be set off against the company's Schedule F liability for that year. Any surplus still available may be set off against a shortfall or carried forward. Section 62 (8) prevents a loss set-off against the surplus.

The notional surplus is calculated under the rules of section 85, Finance Act 1965 as amended, and is the greater of:

(a) the one-year surplus; and

(b) the three-year surplus.

The one-year surplus is relevant only in the special cases where most of the income arising in 1965–66 suffers income tax and profits tax and is not considered in this paper.

Calculation of relief

1. Definition of terms

(a) 'Company' means a UK-resident company.

(b) 'Dividends' means gross dividends and includes any 'excess dividends' deemed to have been paid in 1966–67 under the provisions of section 83, Finance Act 1965. Capital dividends, however, are excluded. The 1968 Finance Act introduced further detailed rules on dividends and these are considered below.

(c) 'Distributable profits' are basically 'after-tax' profits. They are calculated according to the special rules of section 85 (6) (b), Finance Act 1965. Worksheet 2 appended sets out a skeleton outline for computing these profits.

2. General

Broadly, the three-year surplus is the excess of:

AGGREGATE GROSS DIVIDENDS paid in 1966–67, 1967–68 and 1968–69

AGGREGATE DISTRIBUTABLE PROFITS of the years to March 31st, 1967, 1968 and 1969.

Limited so that relief does not exceed income tax borne in 1963–64, 1964–65, and 1965–66.

As may be expected, however, deeper waters than that must be waded. Adjustments must be made, and group provisions and anti-avoidance rules require consideration.

It is easier to ignore for the moment the position of company groups (which is dealt with later and for which special complex rules apply) and accordingly Worksheet 1, which shows a detailed skeleton outline for calculating the three-year surplus, illustrates only the non-group position. A study of Worksheet 1 will reveal the nature of most of the factors which complicate the simple situation. Each of these factors is now considered.

3. Dividends

Before the Finance Act 1968 the calculation was concerned only with gross dividends (excluding capital dividends but including 'excess dividends' under section 83) paid in the three years to April 5th, 1969.

Section 25 of the 1968 Act introduced a further limitation. This operates where dividends (excluding capital dividends) paid in the three years to April 5th, 1969, are related to accounting periods exceeding three years. In such a case the dividends brought into the calculation are limited to those related to the first three years of that period and which were paid on or before April 5th, 1969.

But where any dividends paid in the three years to April 5th, 1969, relate to an accounting period ending before April 6th, 1965, dividends brought into account are limited to those for a period of three years beginning with the accounting period in which April 6th, 1965, falls. The following example should make this clear:

1964	3,000	April 10th, 1966 ..	3,000
1965	2,700	Nov. 20th, 1966 ..	2,700
1966	4,300	Nov. 20th, 1967 ..	4,300
1967	2,400	Nov. 20th, 1967 ..	2,400
1968	6,000	April 3rd, 1969 ..	6,000

In this case, the accounting period in which April 6th, 1965, falls is the year to December 31st, 1965. Therefore the dividends to be taken into account are limited to those declared in respect of the three years to December 31st, 1965, 1966 and 1967.

What is the purpose of these new rules? Quite simply, to prevent tax avoidance. The Chancellor reasoned that many companies would artificially increase their three-year surpluses by declaring a dividend just before April 5th, 1969, out of profits not yet earned. For example, if a company normally declared a dividend on June 30th every year, there was nothing to stop the directors declaring a dividend three months earlier than usual in 1969.

Without section 25 of the 1968 Finance Act, the company would have had a bigger three-year surplus and everybody except the Chancellor would have been perfectly happy.

In practice, however, it seems that section 25 will be relatively ineffective by itself because a company can choose the profits out of which it pays its dividends. An interim dividend for 1969 paid on April 4th, 1969, would be excluded if the last year for dividends to be brought in was 1968. But if the dividend was merely called a final dividend for 1968, it would be included. It seems, therefore, that the Chancellor is relying on the dividend restraint policy to support this legislation.

Section 25 does not apply to a company which commenced liquidation before June 21st, 1968.

4. Overspill relief adjustment

Overspill relief is also a transitional provision (section 84, Finance Act 1965).

Under the old UK tax system, a company with overseas trading income obtained double taxation relief against its income tax and profits tax liabilities. Thus up to 1965–66 its maximum relief was at 56·25 per cent. From 1966–67 credit is available only against its corporation tax (latest rate 42·5 per cent), and overspill relief is designed to compensate for this reduction in credit under the new system.

In calculating the three-year surplus, a deduction in respect of overspill relief must be made, as shown at line 4 in Worksheet 1. This deduction is found by:

(i) Ascertaining the gross dividends for the three-year period (excluding 'excess dividends');

(ii) deducting from this the amount on which tax at 41·25 per cent would equal the overspill relief for the years 1966–67 to 1968–69 (to calculate this merely multiply such overspill relief by 2·424).

The amount of the deduction is then the proportion of the excess of dividends over distributable profits which the balance at (ii) bears to the dividends paid. Worksheet 3 illustrates the calculation of the overspill adjustment.

5. Limitation

The three-year surplus must be limited so that the income tax relief attributable to it does not exceed the income tax ultimately borne by the company in the years 1963–64, 1964–65 and 1965–66.

The income tax ultimately borne for those years is the amount paid by deduction or otherwise (at the net UK rate where appropriate) after deducting all reliefs and any tax recovered by deduction from annual payments, etc., or by deduction under section 184, Income tax Act 1952 from dividends paid. Worksheet 4 shows an outline for computing this amount.

6. Summary

In summary, the three-year surplus can be defined as:

the excess (adjusted for overspill relief) of the gross dividends (other than capital dividends, but including excess dividends under section 83 Finance Act 1965)

Group provisions

1. General

Section 85, as originally enacted, proved over-generous to groups of companies, since it enabled a group-member receiving dividends to inflate its three-year surplus in the following way.

(a) By arranging for its subsidiaries to pay maximum dividends before the start of the three-year period, thus topping up its accumulated profits out of which it would pay dividends after April 5th, 1966; and

(b) by restricting dividends paid up to them in the years 1966–67 to 1968–69, so reducing its distributable profit.

This procedure had a bonus feature in that it increased the limitation of the income tax ultimately borne in the years 1963–64 to 1965–66.

Amendments made by the 1966 Finance Act (which are effective as from August 5th, 1965) closed this loophole. For this purpose two companies are members of a group if one is a subsidiary of the other, or both are subsidiaries of a third company. ('Subsidiary' in this context means a company which is at least 75 per cent owned by its parent, in terms of ordinary share capital.) The group provisions draw no distinction between resident and non-resident companies. Consequently a foreign parent and its UK subsidiary would constitute a group.

References to a company in the remainder of this text under 'Group provisions' means a company which is a member of a group. Distributable profits are referred to as 'DP'.

2. Subsidiary retaining profits

The rules under this heading (Schedule 7, paragraph (4), Finance Act 1966) are tantamount to a 'direction'. They

Income tax ultimately borne
Total for three years (limitation) cater for the situation where a parent (A) arranges for its subsidiaries to restrict dividend payments in 1966–67 to 1968–69 in order to inflate A's three-year surplus.

In substance, the rules provide that for the three years to March 31st, 1969, a company must ignore the actual dividends received from other group-members and calculate its three-year surplus as though it had received as dividend its share of the DP of the other group-members. The rules do not, of course, apply if the actual dividends received exceed that share.

3. Reduction in three-year surplus of payer

Where a company pays dividends to other group-members, its three-year surplus (as calculated under section 85) is reduced proportionately. Thus if all its dividends in the three relevant years (1966–67 to 1968–69) were paid to group-members, its three-year surplus is reduced to nil.

4. Increase in three-year surplus of recipient

Under certain circumstances, the three-year surplus of a company (A) can be increased, or if nil, will consist of the increase. These circumstances are where:

(i) the distributable profits of A include dividends from other group-members; and

(ii) one (or more) of those group-members (B) has a three-year surplus which has been reduced under (3) above, and part of the reduction is referable to A.

In other words, the intention is to give some relief to counter the fact that the dividends paid by B (whose three-year surplus has been reduced) are included in the DP of A (thus reducing A's three-year surplus).

[It is anomalous, as pointed out in the recent submissions by the allied accountancy bodies to the Board of Inland Revenue, that this increase is not allowed where a group member's three-year surplus has been reduced for other reasons, e.g. due to an insufficiency of tax ultimately borne in 1963–64 to 1965–66.]

Muddying the waters somewhat, Schedule 7, paragraph 2 (3) of the Finance Act 1966 defines the amount of the increase (X) in the following terms:

'Subject to sub-paragraph (2) above, the said amount shall be the excess of:

(a) what the company's excess of dividends over distributable profits would be if the dividends paid to the company by each member of the group within sub-paragraph (1) (b) above were reduced by an amount equal to the company's part of that member's excess of dividends over distributable profits; over

(b) what the company's excess of dividends over distributable profits actually is, and so that if there is no actual excess at (b) the said amount is, subject to sub-paragraph (2) above, the amount at (a).'

Putting that in a different way, the increase is A's part of each group-member's excess of dividends over distributable profits (using these terms as defined by Schedule 7, paragraph 2 (4)).

To calculate X:

(a) ascertain A's actual excess of dividends over DP;

(b) calculate what A's excess of dividends over DP would be if A's profits had excluded A's share of B's excess of dividends over DP. (e.g. if A receives half of B's dividends, in calculating A's DP for this purpose, 50 per cent of B's excess of dividends over DP is excluded).

(c) Deduct (a) from (b), to give X.

However, X must be limited to the total reductions under (ii) above which are referable to A. In this connection, dividends paid outside the group are disregarded in calculating A's proportion. Appendix 1 illustrates the application of these rules.

A three-year surplus has to be increased under these provisions before it is reduced under (3) above. 'Excess of dividends over DP' means the excess at line (3) in Worksheet 1, i.e. before adjustment for overspill relief. Appendix 2 shows the three-year surplus position for a wholly-owned group.

The 1968 Finance Act (section 26) introduced machinery to apply these rules to multi-tier companies, so that a parent may now include in its three-year surplus the revelant proportion of the excess of dividends over DP of its sub-subsidiaries as well as its direct subsidiaries.

5. Election

A company having a three-year surplus reduced under (3) above may elect to use its three-year surplus even if its one-year surplus is greater. Presumably this is to allow the parent of such a company to obtain the benefit of the increase in three-year surplus explained above.

6. Excess dividends

Where a company (A) receives dividends from a group member (B) which has paid excess dividends under section 83, Finance Act 1965, then when calculating the tax ultimately borne by A in 1963–64 to 1965–66 (for limitation purposes), part of the dividend is treated as never having been paid. This part is the same proportion as the excess dividends of B bears to its total dividend payments in 1965–66.

These rules do not apply unless the dividends from other group-members in 1965–66 exceed one-third of the dividends received by A in its standard period from companies which were then A's group-associates.

Where dividends are excluded by the above rule, A can elect that the exclusion shall be the part of dividends from other group-members which is equal to the excess.

Other features

1. Winding-up

On a winding-up, the three-year surplus is computed by reference to the period ending with the last accounting period, if that ends before March 31st, 1969. Where dividends paid relate to a period of over three years, the dividends are limited (see section 25 (3) Finance Act 1968).

2. Shipping

Shipping companies can elect that the limitation regarding income tax borne in 1963–64 to 1965–66 can be extended to income tax borne between 1956–57 and 1965–66. For this purpose a company is a shipping company if the greater part of its undertaking consists of the ownership or operation of ships.

3. Group relief

Group relief is ignored in calculating the three-year surplus.

4. Non-resident companies

Clearly when a UK company is wholly-owned by a non-resident company, there can be no three-year surplus since the subsidiary's surplus is reduced to nil, and there can be no corresponding increase for the parent. This is most inequitable but it appears that unless a Revenue concession is granted, groups wholly-owned by foreign parents must suffer. To make the position even more anomalous, a UK company owned (say) 70 per cent by a foreign parent would be granted a three-year surplus.

5. Procedures

For claiming relief under the three-year surplus rules, Part I of Schedule 12, Finance Act 1965 has effect (i.e. the Schedule F procedures apply). Thus when a company makes the appropriate claim to the Revenue, it will get a repayment based on the notional surplus of the income tax which it has already accounted for.

The question then arises of how this repayment should be treated in the financial accounts. Since it represents a refund of money paid out of profits, it would seem that the repayment should be credited to accumulated profits.

6. Tax planning

There is limited scope for effective tax planning in regard to the three-year surplus, and no planning whatever can be done without forecasting profits and dividends up to March 31st, 1969.

The obvious planning step is to increase the dividend payments up to March 31st, 1969, in order to get maximum relief but before doing so the following points should be considered:

(i) The possible surtax effect on individual shareholders.

(ii) The tax effect on companies receiving the dividends, particularly where international tax aspects are involved.

(iii) Where there is a group structure, the possible consequences for other group members, vis-à-vis the 1966 Finance Act rules.

(iv) The dividend restraint rules.

Three other planning points are:

(a) If a three-year surplus is forecast, a company could anticipate the tax repayment due by paying an extra dividend before March 31st, 1969, and thus increasing the surplus still further.

(b) Since losses incurred by a company in a group are ignored in calculating the three-year surplus, the transfer of an unprofitable member's trade to a profitable company in the group could increase the three-year surplus. Other tax consequences of this manœuvre would, however, have to be watched very carefully.

(c) Since capital dividends are excluded, only Revenue dividends should be paid in the relevant period.

New Light on Medieval Manorial Accounts

by KENNETH S. MOST, LL.B., F.C.A.

Some critics of the profession assert that accountants should not use estimates but confine themselves to facts. In this article, Mr Most – now at the Department of Accounting, University of Florida College of Business Administration – adds some perspective to the controversy.

THE short-lived monthly The History Teachers' Miscellany[1] was fortunate to have as its first contributor, the Rev. William Hudson, F.S.A. This octogenarian Norwich clergyman was a noted historian of the ancient East Anglian city of Norwich, and a former editor of the Norfolk Archaeological Transactions; his research is included in the publications of the Selden Society. From this unlikely source we are able to obtain valuable information on three important questions of accounting history: the origins of annual accounting; the use of control estimates in accounts; and the separation of non-operating income from operating income in period accounts.

Hudson began with an apologia:

'The title "Account Rolls" does not sound attractive. They are, however, the source of a very great deal of our knowledge of national, municipal, and even domestic life and progress. To get the necessary money and spend it usefully is the first essential of all public and private institutions, and in well ordered public establishments an annual report drawn up by an expert has been required for more than 600 years. Our national records of this kind, the Pipe Rolls, go back to the time of King Henry II. By the close of the 13th century the practice had become fairly general, and very large numbers of such reports are still preserved in public and private possession.'

From this source, Hudson was able to provide new insights into the organization of the monastic and lay manors in the thirteenth century, as well as other aspects of the life of the period. In this article we shall consider the accounts of the monastic manors.

The management structure

The ecclesiastical authority of Norwich in those pre-Reformation times kept two classes of records: those relating to the management of the central establishment at Norwich; and the returns of the bailiffs or other officers responsible for the country manors which belonged to the priory, and largely supplied its wants. The former were called 'obedientiary rolls' and consisted of financial reports submitted to the general manager (abbot or prior) by his 'obedientiaries', to each of whom was assigned some portion of the monastic manors or rents.

[1] The History Teachers' Miscellany, Ed. H. W. Saunders, M.A., F.R.HIST.S., was first published in November 1922 (Goose & Son Ltd, Norwich). It ceased publication in 1926. Not many complete volumes now exist; for example, there are but four known copies in the USA, one of which is in Harvard Library.

These officials collected rents and other revenues, such as gifts and taxes originating within their territories; their expenses consisted of those incidental to the performance of their offices and also payments for food, medical care and the other necessaries of the monks' existence. The routine reports of these officials do not contribute much to the matter in hand but the following quotation from Hudson's commentary is irresistible:

> 'As to "eggs £1–6–11" we find that explained in an Account for 1285, where the number of eggs purchased weekly is always specified, and averages over 5000. On one occasion 8700 are accounted for at a price of £1–9–9, which (as fully confirmed by other prices) works out at 25 for 1d. We learn also in that Account that the eggs . . . were entirely discontinued during Lent. They seem to have been bought in the open market. Considering the large number of conventual establishments in Norwich and elsewhere (not to speak of private families) presumably following this rule, one wonders how the egg market met this sudden cessation of demand. Were the hens trained to know the incident of the Lent season, and to restrict the output of eggs to suit the calendar? If so, we can well imagine the joyful cackling as Easter approached.'

The country manors were separate establishments, every manor being self-sufficient, and trained scribes were sent round to each of them once a year after the harvest to record the income and expenditure of the year and to take an inventory. Their reports were submitted to the official at Norwich to whom the particular manor was assigned for supervision. The information they contain relates only to that part of the manor which was the lord's demesne; presumably the tenants worked their own lands as well but we do not possess many records concerning their private economies. If it is permissible to assume that practices found useful in the one relationship would be transferred to the other, then the preparation of annual accounts would be the rule in the management of personal fortunes as well as those of the Church.

The managers of monastic manors are known to us by a variety of names: bailiff, reeve, sergeant, bedell, collector and so on. The cellarer and the steward were officials of the central establishment; though they might well visit the manor now and then, they did not interfere with its management. It is not clear who was the general manager of the manor; Hudson thought it might be one called 'sergeant' (serviens). Under the servientes were two distinct classes of subordinates, a lower class (famuli) of farm workers, and a higher class of supervisors.

The best known of these latter, and historically the most important, was the reeve; this was the old English title for the head of any community being one of themselves, as in the modern form 'sheriff' (shire-reeve). Thus, the manorial reeve was not appointed by the lord but chosen by the tenants themselves, generally by rotation of holdings. The reeve kept records of the year's work due from and done by each tenant, or paid for in lieu; this superintendence was a full-time occupation for the period of office.

The collector gathered in the rents which virtually all tenants had to pay; the bedell was an official of the manor court. While the reeve was the leader of the tenants, the sergeant was head of the manor and took responsibility for the annual accounts presented to the central establishment.

This division of tasks has been overlooked by some historians, who have seen the bailiff as the man responsible for the management of the manor. It is true that in subsequent times the managing official of a farm in the interest of the lord was his bailiff, but this title denoted one appointed by the lord and responsible to him alone, whereas the manorial servientes managed the manor from within and we shall see that a form of accounting control was exercised by the officials of the central establishment.

It is noteworthy that though England was an agricultural country, the working of the land was generally poor. Some monks, however, were expert farmers and their abbeys grew rich; this was one of the causes of tension between the clergy and the laity in those times.

Manorial accounts

The manorial accounts were submitted in narrative style without any attempt at tabulation or juxtaposition, although income and expenditure were shown separately, followed by the balance. At the close of many of these reports the accountant states that the proficuum (profit) for the year was so much. At Norwich there is a roll extending over several years about the year 1300, and containing a report of the 'Proficuum manerorium' for all the manors belonging to the Prior of Norwich.

Besides the proficuum, the accountant also ascertained the 'wainage' for the year. The following example (from the account for Martham in 1272) illustrates the use of this term.

> 'Receipts. Rents of Assize £2.5.4¾d. Issues and Perquisites £19.19.9½d. Corn sold £4.4.7d. Stock sold £4.5.0d. Total £30.14.9¼d.

In the Grange account:

> 'Wheat sent to Norwich 53 qrs. at 5/6d. per qr. (£14.11.6d.) Barley (malt) 99 qrs 4 bs. at 5/–, £24.17.6d. Total £39.9.0d.

The total expenses amounted to £27 11*s* 11½*d*. In another place we find:

> 'Proficuum this year £42.7.1d. Of which from Rents of Assize Issues and Perquisites (as above) £22.5.2d. And so from Wainage £20.1.11d.

The significance is almost certainly this: the 'all-inclusive' net income of the manor was £42 7*s* 1*d*, but the operating net income amounted to £20 1*s* 11*d*. Otherwise stated, receipts from the sale of corn and stock, plus the estimated value of produce sent to the central establishment, minus expenses, equalled the 'wainage' or net income from cultivating the arable land of the manor.

Hudson attributes the word 'wainage' to gagnagium or gain, which was spelt 'wainagium' in those times; he quotes the Magna Charta in which it is decreed that a villein may only be amerced 'saving his wainage', i.e., his agricultural implements. 'Wainable land' was land capable of being tilled but both of these last usages may be closer to the Anglo-Saxon 'wain', a four-wheeled vehicle for the transportation of goods (Ger. Wagen); Lloyd's Encyclopaedic Dictionary gives for the verb 'to wain': '. . . 3. To raise, to lift'. The wainage was profit 'raised' from the land.

Crabb (English Synonyms) thus distinguishes between gain and profit:

> 'Gain is here a general term, the other terms are specific: the gain is that which comes to a man; it is the fruit of his exertions, or agreeable to his wish: the profit is that which accrues from the thing. . . .'

A similar distinction is made by accountants in respect of net profit and trading profit, and by economists, e.g., in Hicks's view of income as a fund for consumption and Fisher's concept of income as the services produced by capital. Gainage (O. Fr. gaignage) was a legal term meaning the gain or profit from tilled land, raised by its cultivation.

Significance and conclusions

The significance of this distinction in aiding the central establishment to exercise control over the manorial farms can be seen from the same source. The wainage was compared with a previously fixed valuation, arrived at by means of the surveys which provided a detailed description of each lord's demesne on each manor, how many ploughs were required to work it and how much it ought to yield per acre. By comparison with this 'extent' or valuation the year was reckoned one of loss or gain. Thus in 1300, Martham recorded a wainage of £17 18*s* 0¼*d* from 177 acres 1 rood sown at 3*s* per acre, i.e., at an 'extent' of £26 11*s* 9*d*. A loss of £8 13s 8¾d was entered in the account.

In Hemsby the same year, the wainage produced the amount of £50 6*s* 10¾*d* from 312 acres, against an extent calculated at 3*s* per acre and amounting to £40 18*s* 3*d*. The accountant recorded: 'So to vantage beyond extent £9 8*s* 7¾*d*.' The same year Hindringham could only get a wainage of £9 7*s* 3¼*d* from 223½ acres sown at 2*s* per acre, the extent being £11 3*s* 6*d* and the loss recorded amounting to £1 15*s* 10¾*d*.

We may note that yearly accounts appear to have been the rule in agriculture in thirteenth-century England, and this finding contrasts sharply with views expressed by Schmalenbach, Littleton, Yamey and others on the periodical accounts of the merchants trading at the same time and in the ensuing two or three centuries.[2] Schmalenbach believed that annual accounts became the rule about the end of the seventeenth century; Littleton could find no importance given to 'periodical closing' by medieval merchants. Yamey has called in question the whole thesis that accounts had usefulness to merchants in making their decisions.

Perhaps the significance of these observations lies in a failure to recognize that the prime utility of accounts has always been to assist in a process of management; concentration on the stewardship aspect of accounts has led to a neglect of the managerial aspect. The medieval large-scale agricultural establishments required management accounts; the individual medieval merchant operating on a large scale (Datini, Medici) likewise.

According to Oschinsky[3] there is a notable lack of formularies for accounts of monastic estates and he suggests that young clerks learned accounting chiefly by practice and not by theoretical instruction. It is tempting to see in this an explanation for the efficiency of the monastic agriculture compared with the rest of the economy at that time but the explanation probably lies elsewhere. According to Hudson, the monks would send the cleverest of the young men on the manorial estates to Oxford to study, and it is likely that they learned accounting there, since it was taught as a branch of the ars dictandi.

Equally interesting is the observation that estimates were included in accounts, since the argument is often put forward that this is a relatively modern feature in accounting. Indeed, some voices in Britain, Australia and the United States have been heard to the effect that estimates – and particularly expectations – are out of place in accounts, which should be restricted to the consequences of market transactions. The accounts of the medieval manors show no such hesitations; not only do they incorporate estimates, or imputed values, for goods supplied by the manor to the priory without passing through a market – which might well have been arrived at by reference to current market prices – but they show the use of non-market control estimates of a different kind.

The inclusion in the accounting reports of a comparison between the standard result and the actual result meant in effect that the medieval prior was better served by the accounting reports which he received than the great majority of twentieth-century investors and other financiers can claim to be.

FOR STUDENTS

The Quotations Department of the Stock Exchange

by W. S. WAREHAM, Head of the Department

AS head of the Quotations Department of the Stock Exchange I am primarily concerned with the administration of the very extensive requirements for admission to listing or grant of quotation – whichever term one may choose – on the London Stock Exchange, and with the maintenance of a close liaison with the other Federated Stock Exchanges in this area of operation.

The Stock Exchange is, of course, a part of the UK capital market, but it is important that we understand that the primary function of the Stock Exchange is to provide a market. This market is one where securities may be bought and sold, and one of the underlying principles of any market is that if its users are to have confidence in the market, there must be efficient machinery to ensure fair dealings and efficient procedures for the settlement of the business, and for the provision of adequate information about the commodities traded. It is this last principle with which the greater part of the work of the Quotations Department is concerned.

Facility of marketability

A company may wish to issue securities to finance new capital expenditure and this operation will be facilitated if the subscribers are assured of satisfactory marketability; that is, that the securities are or will be quoted on a Stock Exchange which provides an efficient market, thereby providing liquidity for the securities issued.

This facility of marketability has liberated funds for the benefits of central and local governments, public boards, large organizations and a great many other companies. Some 9,500 securities are quoted on the Stock Exchange with a market valuation of £103,000 million; of these, about 1,000 with a market valuation of £21,000 million are Government securities and about 8,300 are securities of nearly 4,000 companies. The equity securities of those companies have a market valuation of some £77,000 million and the fixed income securities a market valuation of some £5,000 million.

Before dealing with the work of the Quotations Department I think it is also advisable to understand the background to the administration of the Stock Exchange. The Stock Exchange is administered by a Council of 36 members who have delegated many of the functions to committees who, in turn, delegate certain functions to the executive. The Council's powers and duties in connection with quotations are delegated to the Committee on Quotations which consists of some 11 members of the Council and a small group of this committee – comprising the two joint chairmen and two joint deputy chairmen – sit as a panel of the committee in order to discuss various problems arising from the committee meetings, or from preliminary points with regard to prospective issues or other problems. The general administration of the rules and rulings of the committee and panel, together with certain other delegated functions, are undertaken by the Quotations Department of the Stock Exchange which consists of permanent officials – among whom are chartered accountants, chartered secretaries and solicitors.

An issue of securities by a company has, of course, to comply with such requirements of the Companies Acts, Prevention of Frauds Investment Act and the Depositors Act as may be appropriate, whereas borrowings and capital issues by central and local authorities and public boards must comply with the legislation appertaining thereto and additionally in certain cases the requirements of the Companies Acts. If the company wishes to have the security quoted on the Stock Exchange then the requirements of the Stock Exchange must also be fulfilled and the procedure to be adopted in the case of an application is contained in the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange.

From time to time the Stock Exchange has made alterations to its rules to strengthen the code of dealings to improve the efficiency of the market, to establish a compensation fund to protect the public against default by a member firm, and more recently, much greater control over member firms and more particularly over their accounts and margin of solvency. The provision of timely and adequate information in varying degrees about the securities traded has, however, a long history of continuing development through recommendations and requirements of the Stock Exchange and is one of the essential principles if the market is to achieve a high standard of efficiency.

In this matter of adequate information, the objective of the Stock Exchange is to ensure the availability of all relevant information about the securities traded, so as to enable investors to judge for themselves the merits of any proposition and to ensure satisfactory procedures to exercise rights, privileges, etc.

It is, I think, important to differentiate between the aims of the law and the aims of Stock Exchange rules. The law must of necessity lay down minimum requirements; but the Stock Exchange aims to elicit the maximum practicable amount of information in order to retain the confidence of the investing public in the market. I think it would be true to say that the principle that it is in the interest of the quoted company as a user of the market that the confidence which is undoubtedly engendered by a constant flow of statistical and other information is maintained, is generally accepted. It is noteworthy that the

The substance of a talk given at the recent 'Capital Structure' course of the Chartered Accountant Students' Society of London.

Legislature has, in turn, placed its confidence in the Stock Exchange in the delegation to the exchange of powers under the Companies Acts to grant certificates of exemption from the requirements of the Fourth Schedule to the Act (contents of prospectuses).

Applications for quotation

One of the first requirements, and a very important one, is that applications for quotation must be sponsored by a broker member who will represent the company or borrower or its agents before the committee or the department. The member will act as a channel of communication between the sponsors and the Stock Exchange but this does not prevent direct approaches, provided they are with the knowledge or agreement of the member. The member will also act to ensure that the proposition is one in which the market are likely to have confidence and that apart from the Quotation Department's vetting of the issue, a full and fair picture of the proposition is presented.

The broker will also be concerned, in conjunction with the sponsors, with the climate of the market for the timing of the issue and the price, all matters which are outside the functions of the Quotations Department, and finally the broker will continue to represent the company in all matters which may arise from time to time after the grant of quotation.

The broker who may be intending to make application for quotation will normally consult the Quotations Department at an early stage – after first completing a letter of application and obtaining lists of the appropriate requirements – if a concession is sought, such as a placing or introduction or some waiver from the full advertising requirements.

The officers of the company will also be concerned, in conjunction with this stockbroker, as well as solicitors, issuing houses and accountants, in providing all the information and documentation in connection with an initial application for quotation or an application in respect of a further issue of securities. The detailed requirements and recommendations are set out in the yellow booklet entitled Admission of Securities to Quotation. The same information will have to be published in connection with an initial application for quotation whether it is in the form of a public prospectus, including offers for sale, or a Stock Exchange advertisement in the case of placings and introductions.

These applications may cover a much greater field than companies securing a quotation for a first time since we have very firm rules in regard to reverse take-overs, substantial acquisitions involving change of control, 'shell' operations and changes of business, which normally necessitate a temporary suspension of quotation pending a fresh application for quotation in which the company is treated as if it were an entirely new company to the Stock Exchange. A company will have to be of reasonable size – the present yardstick is that it must have a market valuation of at least £$\frac{1}{4}$ million and for any one security for which quotation is sought there must be an expected market valuation of at least £100,000. There must also be a reasonable spread of shareholding without which a market could not function.

The business and its prospects, a trading record and the financial position, must be fairly and adequately presented in the prospectus or advertised statement; for our object is to secure adequate disclosure to enable the investing public to make up its own mind on the merits of the proposition. 'Adequate disclosure' is, of course, not something which can be defined in any set of rules – except as a series of minimum requirements – but the Stock Exchange rules are so drawn as to allow the officials of the department, in scrutinizing a draft prospectus or other document, to ask those questions and to ensure the inclusion of answers to those questions, which might be asked by any reasonable potential investor.

Investigating accountants' reports

In the mass of information included in the prospectus, the investigating accountants' report is, of course, of very great importance; in the booklet Admission of Securities to Quotation will be found a whole memorandum of guidance devoted to those reports, to the independence of which we attach considerable importance.

In a prospectus under the Companies Act the report will be by the auditors who may be joined by another firm of reporting accountants. We require that accountants should be independent both of the company and of any other company concerned, to the same extent as is required of auditors under the Companies Acts.

Further, a report which contains qualifications or reservations as to any of the profit or loss reports, or as to the assets and liabilities, would not normally be regarded as acceptable by the department. Unfortunately, cases still do arise where the accounts of some of the businesses being acquired contain qualifications because the auditors do not take the normal measures about stock valuation. Such qualifications or reservations are likely to result in a deferment of the prospectus until at least one or two years' profit record without any qualifications or reservations can be produced. The Stock Exchange is not normally prepared to consider the grant of a quotation where the figures reported on are more than nine months old.

It will also be noticed from a study of the detailed requirements, that we require a letter from the reporting accountants confirming:

(1) that they have obtained sufficient evidence that stocks and work in progress were properly ascertained throughout the period under review and in arriving at the report on profits and losses were consistently taken into account;
(2) that, in their opinion, provisions for depreciation and amortization charges are considered in conjunction with any qualifications or reservations included in their report to be reasonable, having regard to certain specified circumstances; and
(3) there is no material difference between the net tax value of fixed assets and the value upon which capital allowances may be obtained in the future, unless this is made clear in the prospectus by means of a tax equalization account or other appropriate adjustment.

General undertaking

The next requirement I wish to refer to is the general undertaking which the company seeking quotation will be required to complete and which I believe to be of considerable importance, and above all, of continuing importance. Although this undertaking is a formal agreement, its primary purpose is to form a relationship with the company, and experience has disclosed a spirit of co-operation which has been of mutual advantage. I propose, therefore, to deal with this undertaking in rather greater detail than I have done with some of our other requirements.

Broadly speaking, this undertaking is concerned with immediate communication of information which is likely to affect the prices of the securities or influence investment decisions, the production of half-yearly profit statements, the inclusion of certain information in the annual report and accounts, the pursuit of certain practices and procedures for the benefit of the investor either in exercising his rights or in the transfer of his securities and the submission, in proof form for approval, of all circulars to be issued to holders of securities.

Communication of information

A company is expected, not only by the Stock Exchange, but by its shareholders and others who are interested in its securities, to release promptly any information which is likely to affect the price of the securities or to influence investment decisions. In fact, few things are more damaging to shareholder relations and the confidence of the investing public than information improperly withheld. Furthermore, no board of directors wishes its shareholders to have grounds for criticism because information has been released in such a way that they would not have entered into transactions if the relevant information had been available to everyone or had been released promptly.

Judgement must be exercised as to the proper timing of release of information but it is appreciated that it is impossible to ensure that all shareholders and everyone interested in the securities receive the information simultaneously. A company can, however, ensure that as large a proportion as possible has the information so that no transaction takes place in which one party or his agent is in possession of information of which another is not.

The most important contribution the company secretary can make in this connection is to ensure that the Stock Exchange does not receive the information after it has been released elsewhere. Many of the larger companies use the services of a Press officer or public relations officer either as a consultant or a part of their organization. Experience has shown that it is essential that there should be full co-operation between the secretary's office and the Press officer so that no information is released before it has been communicated to the Stock Exchange. Among the memoranda of guidance incorporated in the Yellow Book is one entitled 'Memorandum of Guidance on Communication of Announcements' which we are informed is particularly helpful in this connection.

The memorandum reminds one that the timing of board meetings is a matter for the convenience and judgement of individual boards, but it is recommended that important decisions, dividends, profits and other matters should if possible be taken and communicated to the Stock Exchange before 3 p.m. to ensure release before the market closes at 3.30 p.m. It is only by following this procedure that a company can be sure that a shareholder does not deal without the knowledge possessed by others; anyone dealing from the moment of time when the information is released will become aware directly or through his broker of the additional information.

The Stock Exchange, London, also ensures that these announcements are received by the Press by handing a copy to the news services. The time when release of information is least likely to be made available to all at once rather than piecemeal is between 3.15 p.m. and 5 p.m. Information released during this period can well become the basis of false markets with buyers and sellers in possession of differing information. It is, of course, appreciated that in some cases – particularly when announcements have to be made simultaneously in the United Kingdom and in centres overseas – the time factor is all important and special arrangements as to the time and method of release must be made.

Shareholder relations

I have already made some reference to the importance of shareholder relations. I believe the greatest opportunity to develop good shareholder relations probably occurs at the time of preparation of the annual report and accounts of a company. The annual report – and in this must be included the chairman's statement if issued separately – is the most important public document produced by a quoted company.

There have been considerable developments in recent years and a well prepared annual report can help to spread knowledge of the company's progress and prospects but there still remain a number of companies which could improve this document and enhance its value. The Companies Act of 1948 laid down the information which was to be given to shareholders in the statutory accounts and directors' report. The new Act of 1967 requires considerably more information to be given; nevertheless, there are still some fields in which the Stock Exchange general undertaking calls for a greater disclosure policy, notably in the case of the geographical location of a company's trading where it trades overseas, and also concerning the operations of subsidiary and associated companies.

Our proxy requirements in connection with the annual report and accounts have, I believe, caused some anxiety and I would like to emphasize that the object of these requirements is merely to ensure that shareholders have every opportunity to express their views. The 1966 revision of quotation requirements has extended the use of two-way proxies to all meetings, with a result that shareholders have adequate opportunities to say 'yes' or 'no' to all propositions, including the adoption of the annual accounts and re-election of directors at the annual meeting.

It has been suggested that the volume of work necessary is out of all proportion to the benefits obtained. The benefit obtained is the confidence of the investing public, and I find it difficult to know how you can measure this benefit for any purpose of comparison. This extension of the two-way proxy requirement, which has been welcomed by individual and institutional investors as well as receiving some criticism, is also advantageous by reason of the wider spread of the shareholding in many companies, in that many shareholders' meetings are held at centres which are convenient only to a small proportion of the shareholders.

The general undertaking calls for immediate communication of dividends, changes in directorate, acquisitions and realizations of assets, changes in the nature of the business or in voting control, proposed capital issues, and any other information necessary to enable shareholders to appraise the position of the company and to avoid the establishment of a false market. Immediately after the relevant board meeting has been held to consider the final dividend, the company is required to notify the Stock Exchange not only the particulars of that dividend but also of the preliminary profit figures for the year – the minimum information required to be included in the preliminary profit announcement as set out in Schedule 7, Part C of the Appendix to the Stock Exchange Rules and Regulations.

A point that is sometimes overlooked is the necessity to add to the profits statement an appropriate explanation of any material change in the profit level or any exceptional transfer to or allocation from profits. In connection with dividend announcements and the closing of the registers or – what is now more customary – the striking of a balance for the purpose of determining the persons to whom the dividend is payable, the matter of timing can be of considerable importance to the convenience of shareholders, investors and other interested parties. The Stock Exchange issues each year to all quoted companies a schedule of recommended dates for dividend action to fit in with Stock Exchange dealing procedures and ex-dividend action.

Interim reports

The Stock Exchange also requires companies to circularize to the holders of securities, not later than six months from the date of the notice calling an annual general meeting, a half-yearly interim report containing information similar to that required in the preliminary profit announcement. A substantial number of companies have anticipated Stock Exchange requirements and issue half-yearly profit figures, together with comparative figures and appropriate explanatory statements which a fair reading of the figures demands.

The Stock Exchange has for some years required a certain amount of information to be given to shareholders on the acquisition of realization of assets. The current requirement is that when a company acquires or disposes of a business or a parcel of assets which, measured by reference to value or price compared with the net assets of the acquiring company or by reference to profits, amount to more than 15 per cent, the company should issue a circular to shareholders giving (with certain exceptions) the information required of a company seeking further quotation, where its shares are already quoted.

In the case of an acquisition this will normally include an accountants' report with a ten-year profit record, and a statement of the net assets at the last balance sheet date. Acquisitions or realizations having a relationship to the parent of between 5 and 15 per cent may be dealt with by a Press announcement which should give details of the assets being transferred, the consideration and the value of the assets, the profits attributable thereto, and the benefits expected to accrue to the company as a result of the transaction.

Transactions concerning assets which are less than 5 per cent in size need not be announced, but if for trade reasons the company wishes to announce these small transactions, the Memorandum of Guidance on Acquisitions and Realizations which sets out all these requirements in detail in the Yellow Book, draws attention to the need in such circumstances to give some idea of the size of the transaction in order not to mislead shareholders and potential investors.

There is one special class of transaction, where assets are being purchased from or sold to a director, past director or substantial shareholder. In the case of a transaction of this class, the Stock Exchange will normally require a full circular to be sent to shareholders in the form I have described; and apart from extremely small transactions – say less than 1 per cent of net assets or profits – in all cases, shareholders' approval must be obtained before the transaction is completed; even in those very small exceptional cases the transaction will have to be fully reported to shareholders.

Another group of provisions in the undertaking requires the prompt certification of transfers against definitive certificates or temporary documents and return on day of receipt, the registration of transfers and other documents without fee, and issue of definitive certificates within one month of the date of expiration of any right of renunciation or (from January 1st next), 14 days after the lodgment of transfers.

Since 1960 the Stock Exchange has attached considerable importance to the pre-emptive rights of the equity holder in the matter of further issues of equity capital for cash. In the absence of very exceptional circumstances the issue of such capital must be offered in the first place to the equity shareholders unless those holders have agreed in general meeting to other specific proposals. This principle which is now included in the undertaking is extended to the issue of certificates having an element of equity (e.g., stocks convertible into equity and options).

Insider trading

I have not entered into the more detailed interpretations of family interests, etc., but I feel it is important to understand that disclosure of service contracts is necessary to enable shareholders to estimate the likely cost of removing management should they ever find it necessary to consider that step. Particulars of substantial holdings and directors' and family interests are called for to enable shareholders to determine approximately the extent of voting control or voting influence in certain areas.

Disclosure of transactions of directors and their family interests helps to deter the small number who may be tempted to deal in the light of privileged information (now usually embraced by the term 'insider' trading) but it can also dispose of unjustified suggestions and rumours regarding such dealings. I think many would also say that the disclosure is no more than any management or privileged proprietors should report as a matter of duty to their fellow proprietors.

The submission of draft circulars to shareholders and debenture holders is probably one of the most useful and effective parts of the undertaking from the point of view of the company secretary. For some years the Stock Exchange has been well to the fore in encouraging companies to give more information in explanatory circulars in connection with propositions and to adopt procedures more convenient to shareholders and to the general business community; their observations are frequently most valuable. It is here more than anywhere, that one has seen the policy of encouragement and persuasion as opposed to compulsion, successfully secure the co-operation of company officials, their solicitors, accountants and other advisers. Here, too, one sees the advantages of the flexibility of operation of Stock Exchange administration in meeting exceptional circumstances or rapidly changing conditions.

I have referred to the main preoccupation of the department and I think it is only fair to say that our task would be many times more difficult but for the high standards of the lawyers, accountants, issuing houses, stockbrokers and others connected with new issues. Those high standards are something unique to the United Kingdom and of which we have reason to be proud.

Finally, there are, of course, numerous other functions with which the department is concerned but I think it is sufficient to indicate that they include the production of the Stock Exchange Official Year Book, the Weekly Intelligence and the Daily Official List. It is also responsible for maintaining the lines of communication of information to the market and the making of securities ex-dividend, ex-rights, etc., at the appropriate time. The department is an authorized depositary under the Exchange Control Act and is also closely concerned with the work of the International Federation of Stock Exchanges.

Finance and Commerce

McManus group

McMANUS GROUP HOLDINGS is the controlling company of a group whose principal activities are the development of land, building construction and property investment. McManus is a name well known to new house buyers in the south of England in particular.

The 1967–68 accounts, from which this week's reprint is taken, besides showing turnover for the first time at the head of the profit and loss account also show a sizeable reduction in what is called 'trading profit' and behind that reduction is an interesting position which the company's new chairman, Mr M. Horowitz, explains at some length in his accompanying statement.

The year under review, he comments, 'was again difficult, accentuated by the rising costs of finance, labour and materials due in part to devaluation'. In those circumstances the year's result is considered 'reasonably satisfactory' and the board felt justified in maintaining a 9 per cent total dividend rate.

But for some years the profits of the group, the chairman says, 'have reflected the position of an administrative structure geared to a rate of sales rather higher than conditions have permitted'. Viewing that position 'against the background of a national decline in housebuilding', the board intends to reorganize the group structure. There is, in the board's opinion, 'unlikely to be any material improvement in demand for private residential properties in the near future'.

Overhaul

Presumably the board is thinking in terms of restricted availability of building society mortgages and the deterrent of rising new house costs. But whatever the reasoning behind the view (and the chairman does not elaborate on the board's thinking) a close look is being taken at the group structure.

The main office at Potters Bar is, the chairman says, 'in excess of our current requirements', and underletting of surplus parts of the building is being negotiated. There is also to be a complete overhaul of the plant yard and depot 'which should release a valuable area of land for under-letting or re-development'.

In addition there is, this year, to be an examination of the position of all the group's subsidiary companies and those which are likely to prove insufficiently productive will be liquidated or cease trading after due consideration has been given to the tax position. This, the chairman points out, 'will have no major effect on the actual operations of the group but will simplify the administration and accounting procedures and so effect worth-while savings overall'.

The intention is to create an economic and compact unit more suitable to carry out a streamlined operation but still able to undertake the present anticipated production programme of up to 500 residential units a year, subject to market demand.

Land purchase policy

This building programme is well supported by the group's current land holdings which will still be increased as suitable opportunities occur. But except in very exceptional circumstances it is not the board's intention to make purchases of land to be held for the long term but to concentrate on acquisition suitably planned for early development.

Mr Horowitz tells shareholders that the effect of the reorganization programme will 'take some little time' to show up in profit terms, but it should equip the group to operate to the most economic advantage under present conditions. Returning to the earlier theme of the absence of any material improvement in demand, Mr Horowitz says 'the outlook for private residential development would seem to indicate a moderate level of activity at present' although 'there will eventually be an improvement in the situation'.

The kind of organization planned could well deal with an expanded programme and could cope with increased business 'without any major change in overhead costs'. The intention also is to keep a close watch on the possibility of acquisitions of companies with land holdings or with development potential so that the size and profitability of the group could be improved.

Look at subsidiaries

The directors' report refers to detailed consideration of the cost of investments in the group in connection with their earning power in future years. Some subsidiaries, it is stated, have ceased trading and the cost of their acquisition is to be written off over a period of three to four years. The total amount involved is £55,903 and in the accounts £22,500 has been written off against capital reserve.

The group profit and loss account has taken into reckoning losses of £83,450 by 'certain companies' but this amount is expected to be recovered in the next few years, particularly having regard to the current values of land holdings shown at cost in the accounts. But as part of the programme for writing off these amounts, £31,000 has been transferred to capital reserve from revenue.

Against the cost of acquiring one subsidiary – Parrish Developments Ltd – there remains £170,135 to be written off against future profits of that company which are expected to be in excess of that amount.

A profit-sharing incentive scheme has been introduced for executive directors of the subsidiaries. The scheme is for a three-year period and began last July. It provides for all participants to share in the group's profits in excess of a basic target of £60,000 pre-tax for the current year and £75,000 a year thereafter. The amount to be provided will be equivalent to 25 per cent of the profits exceeding the basic figures.

CITY NOTES

THERE are influences other than takeovers affecting the stock markets, but few of them count for much. Even the 'weight of money' so often quoted as a market influence turns very much on the takeover position, since takeovers in themselves are creators of new money weight.

The manner in which other influences are brushed aside by those who might have been expected to take an objective view of the stock market suggests that only takeovers, and the insistence that equities must be bought, count for anything at present. The bad December trade figures were a case in point.

The figures were announced on a day of rising share prices and the poor figures were either entirely ignored or translated into terms of more inflation, more weakness in sterling and the rest. Those terms mean higher equity prices. A month earlier, good November trade figures had been translated into returning confidence, brighter balance of payment hopes and good industrial prospects – all of which mean higher equity prices.

That was the reasoning of those who took any notice of the trade figures. The majority of market operators, however, were in all probability far too immersed in takeovers – present and potential – to pay any heed to trade figures at all. In the same way, it seems that the majority are far too concerned with takeovers to consider that a switch of emphasis towards fixed interest stocks is something that might be considered if not now then some time later this year.

THE Board of Trade has announced that forecasts of capital expenditure provided to the Board in November/December 1968 indicate that manufacturing industry and the distributive and service trades were then expecting a rise in their investment between 1968 and 1969, with the upward movement continuing into 1970. For shipowning firms the forecasts indicate a reduction in capital expenditure in 1969 – after the large increases in 1967 and 1968 – with the possibility of not much change between 1969 and 1970.

The forecasts provided by manufacturers confirm the earlier indications of a rise in manufacturing industry's capital expenditure of between 10 and 15 per cent in real terms between 1968 and 1969. Indeed, the forecasts taken by themselves and interpreted on the basis of past relationships could be said to indicate an increase at the top end of this range. For 1970, the preliminary forecasts suggest that the upward movement will continue so that capital expenditure will be higher in 1970 as a whole than in 1969. It is not possible at this early stage, however, the Board states, to give an estimate of the probable size of the increase between 1969 and 1970.

These forecasts for 1969 and 1970 indicate an upward phase in manufacturing industry's investment cycle. Since its peak in 1966, manufacturing industry's investment has been falling gradually (this downward phase of the cycle has been much less marked than in the 1961–63 downturn) until the third quarter of 1968 when, on a seasonally adjusted basis, there was a rise on the second quarter level. Though the quarterly figures can move erratically, this rise probably indicated the beginning of the upward phase now anticipated.

SEASONAL reporting of building society figures is bringing the equally seasonal comment on mortgage interest rates. When an institution of the standing of Industrial & Commercial Finance Corporation has to pay 9 per cent for debenture money and private house buyers can raise mortgages at 7⅝ per cent, then obviously something is out of line somewhere. But for the time being the building societies are attracting, and what is more keeping, money on a 4½ per cent tax paid interest basis.

Whether that position can be maintained is another matter, but the investment inflow position is at present fair, and with a reduced rate of expansion in mortgage demand expected in some sectors of the industry, an interest rate position apparently out of touch with current realities may be held for some time yet.

Taxation Cases

Full reports of the cases summarized in these columns will be published, with Notes on the Judgments, in the 'Annotated Tax Cases'

Cadogan's Settled Estates Co v. C.I.R.

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

November 29th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Surtax – Controlled company – Investment company – Estate or trading income – Computation of additional repairs allowance – Whether on actual expenditure of period – Profits tax recovered – Whether additional apportionment therefor competent – Finance Act 1947, section 31 (2) – Income Tax Act 1952, sections 101, 245, 255 (3), 262 – Income Tax (Management) Act 1964, section 12 (5).

The appellant company, an investment company, was one to which section 245 of the Income Tax Act 1952, applied, and Earl Cadogan was the only person beneficially entitled to its income. For all periods to March 24th, 1960, the company had distributed the greater part of its income by way of dividend. Its income was mainly in the form of rents, but there was also interest from loans and stocks and shares. The company went into liquidation on March 13th, 1961.

A separate direction, dated May 18th, 1965, was made and served upon the liquidators in respect of that part of the company's actual income for the period from March 25th, 1960, to March 13th, 1961, as was estate or trading income. There was no appeal against this direction nor in respect of a separate direction in respect of the income that was not estate or trading income. On the same day a notice of apportionment in respect of the estate or trading income in the sum of £100,967 was served upon the liquidators.

In computing the company's actual income, an amount of profits tax had been allowed, but this amount was subsequently repaid.

It was contended on behalf of the company :

(1) that in computing the actual estate or trading income, allowances for costs of maintenance, repairs, insurance and management, pursuant to sections 101, 175 and 176 of the 1952 Act, should be based upon the actual expenditure of the period under appeal, and not on the average of the preceding five years;

(2) that no sum in respect of the repaid profits tax could be included in the computation.

It was contended on behalf of the Revenue:

(1) that the allowances for maintenance, repairs, insurance and management should be based on the average of the five preceding years as provided by section 101 of the 1952 Act;

(2) that the amount of profits tax repaid to the company should be brought into the computation so as to increase it to £121,258.

The Special Commissioners decided both points in favour of the Revenue.

Held: (1) the Special Commissioners' decision on the first point was not correct, and the allowances should be based on the actual income of the period; (2) their decision on the second point was correct, and the repaid profits tax should be included in the assessment.

Dickinson v. Abell

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

November 29th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice PENNYCUICK)

Income tax – Passing of offer to purchase land – Sum received from purchaser – Whether under enforceable contract – Whether services rendered – Whether consideration for that sum – Whether sum taxable – Income Tax Act 1952, Schedule D, Case VI.

The taxpayer, a farmer, was married to a grand-daughter of Joseph Wint deceased, who left his estate in trust for his widow, and then to his four daughters. The trustee was Lloyds Bank Ltd. One of the assets of the estate was Broadfields Farm about 240 acres in extent and about seven miles from Mr Abell's own farm. A part of Broadfields Farm was let to Mr Mallabar who farmed the adjoining land.

In May 1964 Mr Mallabar asked the taxpayer if the trustee would sell him the four acres he occupied, as he wanted to straighten out his farm boundaries. Mr Mallabar offered £200 an acre, and later increased the offer to £250 an acre. The taxpayer transmitted each of these offers to the bank. In the following month the taxpayer met Mr Mallabar's father at an auction. Mr Mallabar senior told the taxpayer that he had sold his farm for gravel, and he inquired whether Broadfields Farm could also be sold for gravel. Mr Mallabar senior voluntarily offered to put the taxpayer in touch with the company which had bought his farm, and as a result the taxpayer met a representative of Hoveringham Gravel Ltd, and was told that that company would be prepared to pay £66,000 for the farm without any condition as to planning permission. The taxpayer transmitted these facts to the bank, and he was asked to explore the position. He then approached the Midland Gravel Co Ltd, which offered £226,000 for the farm on the condition that planning permission for the extraction of gravel would be granted. The taxpayer transmitted this information to the bank. As Broadfields Farm was within the Green Belt, neither the taxpayer nor the bank thought that planning permission for that purpose would be granted. On June 29th, 1964, Mr Mallabar junior brought a director of Inns & Co Ltd to see the taxpayer. The interview was unsought by the taxpayer, and he had not before had any connection with any servant or agent of Inns & Co Ltd. The taxpayer was informed that that company was willing to offer £100,000 for the farm without any conditions as to planning permission.

The taxpayer stated in evidence that he had never held himself out as a trustee of the Wint estate; that when the offer of £100,000 was made, he stated that he was not in a position to say 'Yes' or 'No'; and that any contract would have to be sent to the bank. At the end of the conversation he asked: 'What is in it for me?', and received the reply that Inns & Co Ltd would pay him £10,000 if the company bought Broadfields Farm for £100,000 or less. No services were specified to be rendered by the taxpayer, he did not offer to speak to the bank; but either that afternoon or the next morning he telephoned the bank that the offer of £100,000 was on its way to the bank. He was asked for his comments, and he said that he would personally accept the offer. Otherwise, he did not advise the bank one way or the other. At no time prior to the sale did the taxpayer disclose to the bank that Inns & Co Ltd had promised to pay him the £10,000 as stated. He was satisfied that if Inns & Co Ltd had in fact paid him the £10,000, he would not have been able to recover it or any other sum. This evidence was accepted by the General Commissioners.

On the following day, a letter was written by the representative of Inns & Co Ltd to the taxpayer, confirming the promise to pay the £10,000 if the company purchased the farm for £100,000 or less by October 1st, 1964, and another letter was written to him on September 8th, 1964, in identical terms except as to the final date for purchase. Eventually Broadfields Farm was sold to Inns & Co Ltd for £100,000, and the taxpayer received the £10,000.

It was contended on behalf of the taxpayer that the only question for the General Commissioners was whether or not there had been an enforceable contract; that the discussions of June 29th, 1964, did not constitute such a contract; that there was no stipulation or expectation as to any services that the taxpayer was to render; that there was no consideration for the £10,000; and that there was no liability under Case VI of Schedule D.

For the Revenue it was contended that it was not necessary for services to be specified, and they could be implied; that the service performed was that the taxpayer got in touch with the bank and told the bank that the offer of £100,000 was on its way, and that he personally would accept it; and that that was sufficient consideration to support a contract.

The General Commissioners found that there was no consideration for the promise to pay the taxpayer the £10,000; and that no enforceable contract had been made, and they therefore discharged the assessment.

Held: as the General Commissioners had accepted the taxpayer's evidence upon the important facts of the case, and as there was no evidence to the contrary, the General Commissioners' decision could not be displaced.

Tomlinson v. Glyn's Executor & Trustee Co and Knox

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

December 3rd, 1968

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Capital gains tax – Settlement – For existing and future children attaining 21 – In equal shares absolutely – Ultimate trust for settlor's son – Disposal of some trust investments – Capital gain arising – Whether trustees or beneficiaries assessable – Finance Act 1965, sections 22, 25, 45

In 1960 a settlor made a settlement for the benefit of the children of his son Gerald. The trustees were the two respondents. The settlement was in favour of such of the children of Gerald as should attain the age of 21 years or marry under that age and, if more than one, in equal shares absolutely; subject thereto, the settlement was for Gerald absolutely.

In the financial year 1965–66, the trustees disposed of certain investments forming part of the trust fund, and were assessed in the sum of £374 in respect of the capital gain thus arising. If the trustees were properly assessable for this gain, the rate of tax would be 30 per cent, but if the infant beneficiaries were assessable, section 21 of the Finance Act 1965 would apply, and no capital gains tax would be payable.

It was contended for the trustees that the infant beneficiaries were assessable in respect of the capital gain, in that they were absolutely entitled as against the trustee to the trust fund within section 22 (5) of the Act. It was contended for the Inland Revenue that the trustees, and not the beneficiaries, were assessable. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the trustees.

Held: the words 'absolutely entitled as against the trustee' referred to someone who was able to direct the trustee how to deal with the trust fund, and was able to give the trustee a good receipt for anything with which he parted; that the infant beneficiaries were not in that position; that the Special Commissioners' decision was not correct; and that the persons to be assessed were the trustees.

Sinsbury v. Burgess

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)

December 6th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax – Back duty – Additional assessments on wife – Other assessments on husband – Businesses in different divisions – Appeal by husband to General Commissioners for his division – Appeal by wife to those of her division – All appeals heard in one division – Whether transfer of appeals from one division to the other – Whether wife guilty of wilful default – Whether case correctly stated – Income Tax Act 1952, section 47 (1), proviso.

Mrs Sinsbury carried on business as a milliner in Nuneaton from 1932 to 1958. In 1948 she married Mr Sinsbury, and in 1952 they moved to Walton-on-Naze, where Mr Sinsbury was in business as a manufacturer of car polish.

Additional assessments on Mrs Sinsbury under the proviso to section 47 (1) of the Income Tax Act 1952, in respect of the millinery business were made in the Nuneaton Division for 1942–43 to 1947–48 and other assessments were made on Mr Sinsbury as her husband for 1947–48 to 1951–52 in respect of the same business. There were further assessments in Clacton Division on Mr Sinsbury in respect of his own business. Appeals were made to the Nuneaton General Commissioners against these assessments and also against assessments on Mr Sinsbury in relation to his own business. The Nuneaton Commissioners decided that the profits of Mrs Sinsbury's business for the years under appeal had been understated; that Mrs Sinsbury had been guilty of wilful default; and they confirmed the assessments as shown in the stated case.

It was contended for the taxpayers (1) that the Nuneaton Commissioners had no jurisdiction, as the appeals had been transferred to the Clacton Commissioners; (2) that the stated case did not accurately record what had taken place at the hearing of the appeals.

Held: (1) there was no evidence that the appeals had been transferred; (2) that the Nuneaton Commissioners had jurisdiction to hear and decide the appeals; (3) that other proceedings should have been taken for the purpose of impugning the accuracy of the stated case. The appeals to the High Court were accordingly dismissed.

Auditing of Computer Systems

THE first course to be held by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales on the special problems facing the auditor in the audit of computer systems took place last week-end at the Hotel Metropole, Brighton. It was attended by 60 accountants, including a number from overseas, together with representatives from other accountancy bodies.

Mr A. Pinkney, F.C.A., chairman of the Council's sub-committee on auditing, was the course director and he was ably supported by a strong team of lecturers and guest speakers representing the large practising firms and computer users. All the lecturers were resident and available for discussion in the bar and elsewhere after each session. This aspect was particularly important in drawing the various parts of the course together to form a total picture.

The course was designed partly as a follow-up to the Institute's courses on the appreciation of EDP, and it was found that a number of members had been present at one or other of those earlier courses. The particular object of this course was to assist the external auditor to undertake the audit work of most computer systems that he is likely to meet in practice. Emphasis throughout, therefore, was on the requirements of the external auditor, to enable him to evaluate the overall system with regard to control rather than from the point of view of efficiency, which was perhaps of more interest to the internal auditor.

Mr Pinkney's opening address dealt with the impact of the computer on auditing techniques. He referred to the main aspects to be covered on the course – the evaluation of internal control and the problems of audit checks and procedures 'without' the computer on the one hand, as well as 'with' the computer on the other.

Procedural controls

The remainder of the first day was taken up with the assessment of administrative organization and standards that should be adopted in an EDP department. In particular, it was suggested which accounting controls should be sought relating to input/output, hardware controls and efficiency, and programmed controls. Although what was said here was often the counsel of perfection, the practical issues were not ignored. A case study discussed in syndicate groups after dinner was designed to emphasize the importance of procedural controls that should interest the auditor.

Mr B. G. Jenkins, M.A., A.C.A., of Cooper Brothers & Co, on Saturday morning presented a stimulating paper on the principles to be adopted in evaluating the overall system of controls. Basically, if manual controls are available, the auditor may limit his work to the consideration of these controls alone. If, however, they are not available, it is necessary to examine the computer controls and possibly the systems development and administrative controls in detail.

Mr I. D. Watson, C.A., of Peat, Marwick, Mitchell & Co, followed with practical considerations in the assessment of the system, showing the relevance of 'accounting' weaknesses (which have relatively more importance for audit purposes) and 'efficiency' weaknesses (which may be reported by the internal auditor to management). It is necessary to ensure that criticisms are constructive and technically accurate and that they are discussed with the data processing manager to determine that there are no alternative answers.

The method of devising procedural audit tests was developed by Mr J. B. Faris, A.C.A., of Deloitte, Plender Griffiths & Co, who showed how an audit program for computer applications might be constructed from the answers achieved in an internal control questionnaire. The remainder of Saturday afternoon and evening was taken up with a second case study dealing with the problems of evaluating internal control in practice. A computer audit program was devised by syndicates from this case study at the same time on Sunday.

Common-sense approach

A claim for a common-sense approach to computer service bureaux was made on Saturday by Mr P. Harryman, managing director of Computeraid Ltd, who emphasized the fact that auditors should be involved at the systems design stage, i.e., before the programs were written and handed to the bureau for processing data.

His points were taken up by Mr L. Fuller, F.C.A., of Arthur Andersen & Co, on Sunday morning. He contended that the auditor would wish to make a critical assessment of the bureau systems, although this would not be of prime importance if there were comprehensive manual controls at the user company. In order for the company to check the output there must be no loss of audit trail. It might be necessary to ask the bureau to include certain standard packages which contained facilities for additional print-outs specifically for auditors.

On Monday morning, following a paper on the role of the internal auditor, given by Mr M. J. Must, B.SC., A.C.I.S., Supervising Auditor, Shell Mex & BP Ltd, and a pointer towards future developments, Mr Pinkney led a review of an arduous but extremely successful course. There should be no lack of candidates for the similar course to be organized by the Institute in June.

Growth, Historic Cost and Profit

SIR, - The following comments are offered on the article entitled 'Growth, Historic Cost and Profit' published in your October 19th issue outlining a new method of providing depreciation taking into account replacement cost and asset growth.

(1) While one readily appreciates the recognition of the factor of replacement cost of the asset in providing depreciation, the relevance of the growth rate is not very clear. The major purpose in amortizing an asset is to build funds out of earnings to replace it at the end of its life. Certainly this aspect is taken care of by taking into account the replacement cost. But growth, while being an essential factor in setting corporate targets, cannot logically be said to affect the cost of asset to be replaced, nor can it always be anticipated to be possible to grow only by profits generated.

(2) If by reckoning this factor it is the intention to take care of technological obsolescence, it is certainly an extremely complex factor to be estimated and provided for. But it does not appear that this is the object in providing for growth factor either.

(3) The fact that operating profits grow, does not warrant a greater amount to be set aside as depreciation.

(4) It is also doubtful whether the Inland Revenue authorities will accept the necessity for providing for growth by means of depreciation.

(5) In the illustrations given in the article, in Case B the replacement cost of the asset is £12,000, while the modified depreciation provision amounts to £13,800. What exactly is the purpose of this additional £1,800 and how will it be disposed of? In Case C, however, the total provision is £7,200 while we require £8,000 to replace the asset. How is the deficit to be made up? Or is it implied that the new asset will be of a smaller capacity costing only £7,200?

(6) If accepted as a better method, the other complications that will set in are:

(a) How to determine the rate of growth?

(b) The rate of growth is never as shown in the illustration perfectly equal and linear over the period of time. Growth rate is actually a compound rate moving in geometric progression.

(7) Further, the second general principle: 'The ratio between the depreciation provision made during the first year of use and the last year should be the same as that between asset cost and its replacement cost, excluding the provisions made separately for asset growth – is based on the theory or assumption that at the exact middle point of the life of the asset the depreciation will be the average or mean and the earlier years less and the later years more. There is no basis for this theory as all non-linear methods of depreciation reckon depreciation to be high in earlier years and low in later years.

Yours faithfully,

S. GANAPATHISUBRAMANIAN,
Director of Studies,
THE INSTITUTE OF COST AND WORKS ACCOUNTANTS OF INDIA.

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – The correspondence on the integration proposals indicates that there is a wide divergence of opinion amongst members of all the Institutes involved, and I understand that the opportunity will be given to every member at home and abroad to vote 'For' or 'Against' the published proposals by means of the extraordinary general meetings to be held in April/May.

The unfortunate aspect of this voting is that there would appear to be no alternative but to vote 'For' or 'Against' the proposals submitted to the members. In my view, the opportunity to canvass every member's views on integration should not be missed, and I would therefore urge the various Councils to consider taking a referendum, either instead of, or in addition to, the voting on the scheme, to ascertain just what the members of the various Institutes would wish to have as the future structure of the profession. To this end I would suggest that the voting form should be broadly on the following lines:

	Yes	No
(i) The scheme submitted to members.
(ii) Integration in principle.
(iii) An amended scheme.
(iv) Federation of the existing Institutes.
(v) No change.

The precise wording could be settled by the Joint Steering Committee or the secretaries and the form should be identical for each Institute.

It is quite possible that a majority of members would be in favour of some form of integration, but not in favour of the existing scheme. Those voting 'Yes' to (i) would leave the remaining spaces blank, whilst those voting 'Yes' to (iii) might be asked to indicate briefly what sort of alternative scheme they would support. The referendum might indicate that there should be further examination of integration, but if members can only vote 'For' or 'Against' the existing scheme, a majority vote 'Against' would surely kill the idea of integration for many years to come.

Yours faithfully,

W. W. WILLIAMS, F.C.A., F.C.W.A.

Cyncoed, Cardiff.

DECIMAL CURRENCY NEWS

The first copy of Decimal Currency and Metrication News, issued recently, sets out to bring to businessmen an appreciation of the developments of decimalization and metrication as well as directing attention to useful sources of information.

Welcoming the new publication, Mr Noel Moore, secretary of the Decimal Currency Board, admits that his Board cannot hope to disseminate all the available information essential for a smooth and efficient change-over to decimal currency. A high degree of awareness concerning developments and techniques in such areas as office equipment will, he says, help smooth and speed the change-over thus assisting the businessman to take the maximum advantages which decimalization offers.

Useful facts are given in articles on tax treatment of change-over expenditure, machine conversion and replacement, dual-pricing, together with informative notes for cheque writing in the new currency as well as suggested decimal conversion tables, and decimal currency time-tables. On metrication, there are articles on retraining requirements for metrication, the case for metrication and a table on metric units and their symbols.

Copies are available on a one-term subscription of £8 10*s* which covers the estimated life of the publication of six to seven years when the change to metrication is due to be completed. Subscriptions should be sent to Rovipress Ltd, 8–10 Parkway, London NW1. The editorial offices are at 162A College Road, Harrow, Middlesex.

INSTITUTE OF INTERNAL AUDITORS

London Chapter

At a luncheon meeting of the London Chapter of the Institute of Internal Auditors on Wednesday, January 8th, Mr R. Glendinning, M.A., C.A., F.C.W.A., President of the Institute of Cost and Works Accountants, and Assistant Director of Accounts of British Rail, gave a talk on railway accounting. He said this was inherently interesting since it differs so much from accounting in manufacturing. Problems of cost ascertainment and control were very different from ordinary industry and, indeed, were very much more difficult than in manufacturing. For various reasons railways were now developing new methods, e.g., traffic costing, which had few counterparts in other industries and they were trying to introduce control techniques in situations which had little parallel elsewhere.

Next Meeting

At the next meeting of the London Chapter, on February 12th, Mr A. Pinkney, F.C.A., will talk on 'An audit approach to computers'. The secretary of the Chapter to whom inquiries for information should be addressed is Mr R. P. Wylde, Iraq Petroleum Co Ltd, Cavendish Square, London W1.

TAXATION ANOMALIES AND PRACTICAL DIFFICULTIES

Correction to Memorandum

We have received from the Accountants Joint Parliamentary Committee the following correction to the memorandum reproduced in The Accountant of December 21st:

Paragraph 13 of the 'Memorandum of some taxation anomalies arising from a consideration of the finance acts' wrongly implies that the Board of Inland Revenue will not normally seek to attribute to a person the right and powers of his relatives, other than his wife and minor children for the purpose of determining whether a company is 'close'. The correct statement is that this concession applies only for the purpose of determining whether two companies are controlled by the same persons – and therefore associated – so that no abatement under section 77 (2) of the Finance Act 1965 is due to either.

This is the first book especially designedand written to assist the cognizant executive in his choice of a computer system – and, through this more efficiently to plan for financial profits.

At the outset it is better to face the fact that management information systems are valuable only as long as they contribute to more effective operations. To help in this direction, the present book is very specific. It may also, in places, be controversial: only challenge can derust the old structures.

Management information systems do not develop the right way just by accident. Wise and profitable machine selection will not come about as a matter of chance. Efficiency with computers – as with any other industrial activity – definitely calls for acts of policy. Albeit, often ones that various persons and departments within the enterprise would greatly resent.

The computer (and the computer industry) has been so far a great international home of hoary myths. The time has come to demystify the whole affair. This calls for courage and for preparation. To that end, the book follows the preparatory phases through clear examples: from systems analysis, to unit runs, file specifications, programming, machine comparisons, computing estimates and the handling of the manufacturer, down to the time of decision.

Selecting the Computer System is designed to particularly appeal to:

- ★ Executives directly responsible for the choice of data processing equipment, and its implementation.
- ★ Senior executives, running operations or functional areas. (They will find in it material of substantial interest to their activities – provided they are determined to go beyond the superficial treatment of the subject.)
- ★ Graduate university students majoring in management, computers and information science.

Users of computer systems urgently need to act in a rational manner, if they are not to become toys in the hands of manufacturers. This is particularly important in 1968 when computers in business, industry and Government have passed the embryonic stage. Lately, the men responsible for computer applications have come to realize that they have either to plan completely their systems work or they had better not plan at all.

The objective of the chapters treating the mechanics of the planning work is to answer challenging questions:

- ★ Where to start?
- ★ Whom to believe in following alternative ways and means in the implementation of an electronic system?
- ★ How to keep pace with change?
- ★ How to evaluate the profitability of automatic information handling?
- ★ How to identify and set the limits of cost expansion?
- ★ Where to base the decision on the use of more powerful electronic media?
- ★ How to distinguish facts from fiction?

According to the National Economic Development Council Report on Management Recruiting and Development some 350,000 managers are engaged in the manufacturing industry alone. Their jobs and those of their colleagues elsewhere are changing. The new breed of managers are technologically-minded men eager for the right information on which to base their decisions.

Behind the change lies the evolution of management sciences and services – among them operational research, linear programming, network analysis, systems analysis, applications of the computer, consultancy, and marketing research.

The earlier chapters of this book are devoted to planning, organization, direction and policy-making and the process of decision.

Further the author tries to show where operational research, network analysis, computer installations, and consultancy come into activities. Finally he has examined the divisions of marketing and purchasing from the standpoint of a board of directors which is responsible for discharging planning and control functions rather than with the eyes of a sales or purchasing specialist.

For the director or chief executive, his review of basic management activities should strike answering chords. For middle management it should provide a stimulus to progress towards even higher responsibilities.

For the student of management whose immediate objective is the successful completion of a degree or diploma course, or who is on the way to achieving the status of a qualified accountant, cost accountant, company secretary, work study practitioner, purchasing officer, O. & M. manager, marketing manager, or training officer there should be a special benefit to be drawn from the author's integrated approach to his subject.

Ford of Britain have been major users of computers in this country for many years and are now poised to use third generation equipment to its full potential. The whole accounting and budgetary control system is being re-thought and re-formed within the framework of company-wide management information systems. These systems exist to centralise all data within a computer complex, transcending departmental barriers. Emphasis is placed on the collection and control of data rather than the recording, which becomes an automatic by-product of the process.

Ford need qualified or finalist accountants to help implement these systems and to interpret and analyse the data they produce. The pioneering nature of the work makes this a crucial and exacting time at which to join a company that has an established name for operating advanced management control techniques. Those selected will be involved not only with financial control records, but with those of production, marketing, purchasing, personnel and engineering.

Because of the all embracing nature of the work this could be the beginning of a career with Ford, not only in Finance, but in many other varied activities in the Company. The Ford Management Development programme leaves nothing to chance and ability is recognised and appropriately rewarded. Standards of selection will be high and final selection will be made personally by the Director of Finance.

SILVER MEDALLIST OF THE INSTITUTE OF COST & WORKS ACCOUNTANTS

Distribution is neglected by cost accountants. Costing started in the factory and unfortunately has remained there, in spite of the fact that the expenditure incurred on transferring goods (including marketing and selling them) has increased substantially since costing was invented.

This book is designed to remedy this omission. It is written for students – particularly cost accountancy students – and tells them in an introductory way, how to account for distribution costs and prepare cost accounting statements for distribution managers.

INTRODUCTION TO BUSINESS COMPUTER PROGRAMMING

T. W. McREA, C.A.

In the beginning electronic digital computers were used solely for mathematical and statistical work, and so, not unnaturally, the programming of these machines was carried out by mathematicians. The most common application of computers today is in the field of commercial data processing, but the myth that a knowledge of mathematics or even of electronics is required before one is qualified to become a programmer is hard of dying. In fact no preliminary qualifications are required for programming except perhaps a certain basic common sense.

This little book is intended for accountants, auditors, managers and others who would like to find out what programming is about. The book is not intended as a 'programmers manual' but rather as an introduction to the concept of programming and the job of the programmer.

The following statistics testify to the lead still held by Foulks Lynch in the field of correspondence tuition for the examinations of the Institute of Chartered Accountants:

In the two years ending with the September 1968 Intermediate examination, candidates presented by H. Foulks Lynch & Co Ltd obtained:

In the Intermediate Examinations

In the Final Examinations

Report on the Revenue

FAILURE on the part of the Inland Revenue to collect Schedule D income tax from subcontractors in the building and civil engineering industries is one of the matters to which attention is directed in the report of the Comptroller and Auditor-General on the Civil Appropriation Accounts for 1967–68. In the report published last week (HMSO £2), the Auditor-General recalls that the Committee of Public Accounts of Session 1966–67 considered the effect, in the fields of taxation and social security, of the growing practice in the industries mentioned of engaging workers as subcontractors instead of as employees. This takes them outside the PAYE system and leaves the Revenue with the task of tracing them and collecting the tax.

This is particularly difficult with itinerant workers, and even when found the subcontractor is often discovered to be without the means to meet the accumulated tax liability. The Revenue have told the Comptroller that they are not satisfied that existing procedures for the collection of tax were adequate for this class of taxpayer.

From April 1965 tax inspectors have called for returns from contractors of payments of £100 or more to labour-only subcontractors. As a result it is estimated that additional tax of about £1·4 million was brought in but that about half a million pounds was probably lost through inability to trace the subcontractor. The procedure for calling for £100 returns has been extended to labour agencies and to services provided by way of labour which involved inconsiderable use of materials.

The Inland Revenue told the Comptroller that they had no comprehensive statistics of the amount of tax assessed but uncollected from subcontractors, though they thought it did not exceed £1 million a year. However, they were considering, with other departments concerned, the proposals of the Phelps Brown Committee. The recommendations of this committee, if adopted, could have the effect of bringing the majority of labour-only subcontractors into PAYE.

In our view, the general flight from Schedule E would be considerably lessened if only the severe restrictions on expense deductions were relaxed.

The Comptroller also has some pertinent things to say about the Revenue's extra-statutory concessions. He recalls that the Public Accounts Committee 1966–67 endorsed the view expressed in a Treasury minute that statutory cover should be sought

'at the earliest opportunity'. The minute in question was, in fact, issued over seventy years ago.

There were 92 concessions in force in November 1968, of which 50 had been in force for ten years or more, and some for 20 or 30 years. The Revenue's published booklet of extra-statutory concessions gives only 70. The Department told the Auditor-General that 23 concessions not revealed in the booklet have been kept out 'because, in the main, they are applicable only to a limited class of taxpayer'. But surely, no matter how few people are concerned as actual recipients of the Revenue's secret bounty, the concessions ought to join the others in the published list. Better still, they should all be made statutory.

Of the 70 published concessions one has now gone; 22 are regarded as appropriate for statutory cover when Parliamentary time permits; 11 are considered inappropriate because their remaining life is short, while 36 are considered unsuitable for statutory cover for various reasons. These reasons are:

'(i) the matter is trivial;
(ii) the cost is negligible;
(iii) legislation would be premature because the subject-matter is new and further experience is required of the sort of cases that arise;
(iv) the length and complexity of the legislation would be disproportionate to the result.'

There are the customary statistics in the report about fraud and evasion in connection with taxes on income and profits. The results of investigations completed in the year to March 31st, 1968, compare with these of the five previous years as follows:

Year ended March 31st	Number of cases	Total charges raised	Penalties and interest included
1968	10,487	13,556,419	4,268,122
1967	11,514	14,722,018	4,731,028

These figures do not include minor settlements effected by local inspectors relating to interest or to settlements with employers of PAYE tax underdeducted. In the year to March 31st last, the former amounted to £1,577,495 (56,995 cases) and the atter, including penalties, to £878,914 (2,171 cases).

Business Tenancies

PART II of the Landlord and Tenant Act 1954 gives a measure of security of tenure for business and professional tenants by providing for the continuation and renewal of the tenancies subject to certain conditions. A report of the Law Commission published last week (HMSO, 5*s* 6*d*) recommends certain changes and sets out the terms of a draft Bill designed to carry them out. The report also contains the relevant sections of the 1954 Act as they will be if the changes are given legislative effect.

The Commission is anxious that any amending Bill should be carefully drawn, in order that the provisions should fit in with Part II as it stands and to enable the Act to be printed as amended. This would certainly be a great improvement on the position, so often encountered in Finance Acts, of having to read several distinct but overlapping provisions together.

At a time when landlords have to endure unfavourable publicity, it is somewhat refreshing to find proposals for protecting them from injustice. Under present law, a business tenant who is enjoying a very low rent can often prolong his advantage long after his tenancy would normally have terminated, by 'dragging his feet' on an application under Part II. The report cites a case where the current market rent was £3,000 per annum but the tenant was paying only £250 for some time after his lease had expired.

On the other hand, the Commission recommends a wider range of improvements, not made at the landlord's expense, which should be disregarded in arriving at an appropriate rent to be fixed for the renewed tenancy. On the landlord's side again, the Commission recommends that when the Court fixes a new tenancy, it should have clear power to insert a rent review clause. This would encourage the Courts to grant the tenant a longer lease, since it would be known that the landlord would not thereby be penalized if the market rents go up considerably.

Although section 38 (1) of the existing Act limits the scope of devices in a new lease to exclude the tenant from his statutory powers, the Commission thinks that one device might be effective, namely, a blank signed notice of surrender given by the prospective tenant before his tenancy is granted. The recommendation is made that legislation should plainly exclude such a device. It is recommended, however, that the provisions for compulsory renewal should be excluded from tenancies for a period not exceeding six months, and also where the Court has sanctioned the original tenancy.

New Pence for Old

THE Government Bill for the implementation of the Decimal Currency Act 1967 was published last week together with an explanatory White Paper – Decimal Currency: the Change-over (Cmnd 3889, HMSO, 2*s* 6*d*). As is generally known, 'Decimal Day' is to be Monday, February 15th, 1971, and this day will be followed by a change-over period (at present indeterminate but unlikely to exceed 18 months) during which transactions not directly involving the banking system may be conducted in either 'old' or 'new' currency and coins of either series will pass as legal tender.

Banks will, of course, be peculiarly affected by the change-over and are to close for all ordinary business on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, February 11th to 13th, 1971, during which period they are expected to clear £ s d items then in transit and to convert their records to decimal working. Thereafter bank balances will be expressed exclusively in the new currency; and cheques, bills of exchange and other instruments drawn before February 15th, 1971, but presented after that date will be converted to decimal equivalents in accordance with the 'new penny' table which is published as Schedule 1 of the Bill and Appendix B to the White Paper. As readers will no doubt be aware, the 'new halfpenny' (for which we predict a limited monetary existence, mainly in retail trade) is not to be used in banking and accounting transactions.

In the case of periodical regular payments of the same amount made by banker's order and the like, it will be possible to discharge obligations expressed in the old currency by paying the corresponding amount according to the 'new penny' table in the new. It may be wondered what will be the practical effect of this proviso (from which wages and salaries are excluded) since the major recipients of periodical fixed-amount orders such as building societies and insurance companies will no doubt follow the banks in early conversion to the new currency, and advise their customers accordingly.

Apart from amounts capable of exact conversion, the maximum discrepancy under the 'new penny' table will be 1·2*d*, and the minimum 0·2*d*. Application of this table to the present standard rate of income tax would achieve a saving of 0·6*d* in the £ to the taxpayer, although a 20 per cent increase in the cheque stamp duty (2*d* to 1*p*) may redress the balance.

One new point of principle, rather than of detail, is to be found in clause 17 of the Bill, which affects the duty laid upon the Decimal Currency Board by the 1967 Act:

> 'to receive and consider, with a view to such provision (if any) as may hereafter be made by Parliament for the payment of compensation in special circumstances, representations with respect to expenditure or loss incurred or to be incurred by particular persons or classes of persons in consequence of the change . . .'.

About 150 letters, inquiries and formal representations have been considered by the Board, which has found itself quite unable to devise any satisfactory criteria for a middle way between general compensation and no compensation. In view of this inability to recommend any scheme which would be sound in principle and administratively viable, the Government propose to relieve the Board of their function of receiving representations about compensation. This proposal will surprise no-one wise in the ways of government, although the Board's difficulties can be recognized. It is not easy, when all are in some measure affected, to select individuals for special treatment; a substantial majority of the commercial population uses accounting or vending machinery in some form, and this (together with the problems of differentiation between the largest and the smallest) has no doubt caused any general provision to appear unworkable. Accounting machines have, of course, for some time past been available on terms which include provision for £ s d/decimal conversion at the proper time.

We have referred already to the 'new penny' conversion table. This, with its companion 'new halfpenny' table (Appendix A to the White Paper) affords another unhappy example of 'government by exhortation', since although both are described as 'Official Conversion Tables' they will, in fact, have no statutory force other than for the conversion of banking and certain other transactions. The Government 'are satisfied that decimalization need lead to no overall increase in price levels' and 'consider it important that decimalization should not be used as an excuse for the re-negotiation or general rounding up of wage rates'; likewise prices 'should not be increased' solely to provide amounts which are exactly convertible. Such phraseology in the White Paper argues a faith which recent events have done little enough to justify. Incidentally, the present common expression of salaries as multiples of £100 p.a. results in monthly payments of 6*s* 8*d* or 13*s* 4*d*, neither of which is exactly convertible, so that perhaps a £-monthly basis will become the future accepted practice.

There are to be changes in the limits of legal tender, the familiar figures of 1*s* and 40*s* for bronze and cupro-nickel coins respectively becoming 20*p* and £5. According to the White Paper, during the change-over period 'where a given amount is due in either currency, the exact or a higher amount in either currency or a mixture of both will be legal tender'. This represents, no doubt of necessity, an inroad into the long-established rule that tender must be of the exact amount due (lest debtors be tempted to defeat or embarrass their creditors by tendering an inconveniently large sum), although presumably the corollary that change, if given, need not be a legal tender still holds good.

Demonetization of the present halfpenny as from August 1st next will cause neither surprise nor inconvenience – except perhaps to the legendary judge who remarked of a worthless claim – 'I should consider a farthing damages grossly excessive, and, as the farthing has now been abolished, I suppose I should have had to award a halfpenny which would have been twice as much'. With the new penny as the unit of nominal damages, some causes will be awarded 4·8, if not 9·6 times as much as they were worth in the past. The half-crown, too, is to pass into demonetary limbo on January 1st, 1970 – 'limbo' because although the coin is demonetized it will still be an offence (under clause 14 of the new Bill) to melt or break it. No doubt there are reasons sufficient to restrain a person in lawful possession of coins which are no longer legal tender from dealing with them as he thinks fit: we remark only that such reasons do not appear in either the White Paper or the Bill itself, and we await their exposition by the Government's representatives when the Bill is debated.

The Human Factor

by An Economic Correspondent

LARGELY as a consequence of its very slow rate of growth, the United Kingdom's labour force has enjoyed a greater degree of full employment since the Second World War than those of most other industrial countries. In the context of the other factors which have been present, this situation has not been consistent with the objective of a high rate of economic growth. Resulting in insufficient labour flexibility and combined with historic cost and non-DCF accounting, it has led to the deferment of investment programmes and to the under-utilization of capacity when investment has taken place.

This lack of flexibility has been largely evident in the marked tendency to overmanning which has been reinforced by opposition to redundancy but which stems less from union restrictiveness than from managerial weaknesses including misguided paternalism, failure to employ modern control techniques, and poor methods of communication. It has also had serious effects in reducing the stimulus to workers to acquire new and higher skills and in reducing the ability of new firms to attract workers for training. High inter-industry, inter-status and inter-occupational mobility of the labour force is a characteristic of modern economic growth. Geographic mobility is also a requirement but one which in Britain is impeded by local housing policies.

Under full employment the rigours of competition are reduced and it is possible for high-cost firms to continue to operate; whereas in more competitive conditions they would normally be driven out of production to the advantage of the general level of efficiency. It is noticeable, however, that when deflationary measures have been taken, the inefficiencies of British industry have, if anything, been usually greater – partly because much of the mentality of the full employment years has endured and partly because worker resistance to improvements in efficiency has risen during periods of rising unemployment. However, a fundamental change now appears to be taking place. One means of improving the situation further would seem to be a general payroll tax.

While greater determination in scrapping old plant and machinery and an improved emphasis on capital-deepening will enable Britain to overcome the disadvantage of the lack of flexibility that a static labour force combined with full employment policies has prolonged, improvements need to be made in the more direct use of human resources.

Lagging educational system

Britain has lagged behind other countries (especially Switzerland, the United States and Sweden) in relating the educational system more closely to technological needs and in developing specific but flexible vocational training; though the establishment of Industrial Training Boards and the expansion of the number of Government Training Centres are substantial steps in the right direction. In 1967, 43 per cent of the boys under 18 who entered employment took up apprenticeships compared with 36 per cent in 1960. But this can only be interpreted as reflecting a favourable trend if it is possible to reject the assertion that apprenticeship agreements almost guarantee that the training will be restricted in scope and poorly suited to the requirements of a dynamic economy.

There is also a relatively acute problem in the need to abandon unjustified discrimination based on race, social origin, age and sex. The Government has permitted a large influx of coloured workers from the Commonwealth, and employers generally have welcomed them as a low-paid labour force. Private employers, however, have not recognized that some of these workers have fairly high educational and vocational qualifications; and, outside the public service, it has often proved very difficult for coloured graduates to obtain professional or managerial employment. Despite the 1944 Education Act and other developments, Britain is still a relatively class-ridden society where birth remains a determinant of status. British firms have also tended to perpetuate the cult of maturity, believing that the arts of industry and commerce lie not in knowing but in doing.

Britain has lagged behind the United States and some other countries both in establishing business schools and in appointing their graduates to responsible positions at an early age. British industrial management seems to embody the nation's traditional distrust of skilled specialists. Possibly even more important, because it is present on a large scale, is the attitude of many private sector organizations to the employment of women in a senior capacity. British women are a potential source of professional, managerial and administrative talent which has scarcely been tapped. Here Britain has a great deal to learn from the Scandinavians.

Employment complications

Britain's post-war economic growth has been characterized by relatively strong inflationary tendencies which have been largely due to the excessive demand for the available supply of skilled labour linked to excessive consumption demand (excessive monetary expansion and the frequent failure to adjust prices quickly and fully to reflect reduced costs due to technical advances are other factors). With a high level of employment, a complicated combination of unfilled vacancies in the growth sectors of the economy and a relatively high rate of open and concealed unemployment in the stagnating and declining industries has persisted.

Disproportionate rises in wage costs have contributed to the recurrent difficulties in the balance of payments which have caused growth in the economy to be hesitant and irregular. This, in turn, has affected investment which could have enabled the vicious circle to be broken. As in other countries, notably Sweden, the restraints on prices and incomes which the Government has applied have not been fully efficient and their generalized effects have consequently been limited to short-term success.

The alternative policy of dampening the expansion of demand tends, however, to create overt and hidden islands of unemployment, both industrially and regionally, and this is not compatible with the full and most efficient use of the nation's resources and the highest attainable rate of economic growth. This divergence in economic objectives can be reconciled only if these islands of unemployment and under-employment are eliminated by regional and labour market measures designed to improve the allocation of resources.

Changes in relative wages have a function in reallocating labour between different industries, occupations and areas. But the many imperfections of the labour market reduce this effect. Ignorance of potential employment opportunities, geographical immobility, inadequate educational levels or professional training, institutional restrictions on access to certain activities and inadequate guaranteed income during retraining all operate to hamper the smooth redistribution of labour which economic advance demands. These imperfections are one of the main reasons why the wage mechanism plays a more limited role than might be expected. The importance of these imperfections focuses attention on how much more should be done to foster the efficient allocation of labour by direct action on structural, geographic and institutional rigidities in the labour market.

Institutions and attitudes

With other industrialized nations now coming to share Britain's problem of a very slowly growing or static labour force, institutional factors and attitudes are likely to be of increasingly major importance in determining comparative productivity levels. Britain is unfortunate in that her early industrial leadership developed both institutions which are now anachronistic, and economic attitudes which have been complacent but which are now giving way to a sense of malaise.

Possibly the most important factor influencing productivity growth is that of attitudes. Attitudes are important not only because they are fundamental: they are of particular importance at a time of pressure on the country's productive resources because their improvement costs nothing. It is noticeable that in those countries where national productivity has increased rapidly in the post-war period, there has been a rapid spread of productivity consciousness. This has been due partly to the demonstration effect of particularly efficient firms and the increasing sharpness of the competitive climate, especially for manufacturers producing for export.

But, whatever the mode of the spread of this awareness, it appears that in many countries its initial impetus was due to a crisis. The economic plight of the devastated countries at the end of the Second World War was unmistakable; and their businessmen and workers needed little persuasion as to the need to use their resources as effectively as possible. Although the tentative signs which are available are promising, whether British industry has reached a similar state of conviction as a result of prolonged economic crisis, culminating in the shock of devaluation, remains to be seen. The certain demonstration of such a state of conviction, in the form of a sustained balance of payments surplus sufficient to repay at a reasonable rate the nation's massive burden of international debt, is necessary if confidence in the external value of the pound is not to collapse. The failure to achieve a balance of trade surplus in the next few months, as a token of this, is likely to result in disaster.

Current Affairs

Appeal on Investment Grants

THE Court of Appeal on Friday of last week reserved judgment in an appeal by the Board of Trade against declarations made by Mr Justice Buckley last April when the British Oxygen Company substantially won their action claiming that its large and small liquid gas tankers, hydrogen trailers and portable gas cylinders were eligible for investment grants under the provisions of the Industrial Development Act 1966. Under the Act vehicles, with certain exceptions, are not eligible for grants.

The case was said to be of great importance to the industry with about £1 million of investment grants at stake.

British Oxygen claimed that the items in question ranked as plant, machinery or storage equipment, used in the process of manufacturing industrial gases, and they were not vehicles. British Oxygen in the Appeal Court cross-appealed against a declaration that certain gas tanker assemblies were not machinery or plant within the meaning of the Act.

Mr Morris Finer, Q.C., for the Board, said before the Act came into force there was a different scheme under which certain benefits were available as of right. Those benefits were by way of deduction of tax on profits. The making of profits was a prerequisite of obtaining benefits. All capital expenditure qualified for allowances.

The benefits provided by the Act were not by way of tax relief but by actual grant from public funds. The Act set out detailed conditions of eligibility but not of entitlement to grant. Even when the conditions as to eligibility were satisfied the Board of Trade retained a discretion as to the payment of grant. The judgment of Mr Justice Buckley had in fact transferred that discretion from the Board of Trade to the Court.

The scheme, said counsel, was a very difficult one to administer and it must be administered fairly.

Public Auditors—Friendly Societies in the Irish Republic

THE Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has been informed by the Department of Industry and Commerce in the Republic of Ireland that the Minister has decided that, in future, appointments as public auditors under the Industrial and Provident Societies Acts 1893 to 1966 and the Friendly Societies Acts 1896 to 1953 are to be made of persons who would qualify to audit the accounts of a company under section 162 of the Irish Companies Act 1963.

As the Minister has, on certain conditions, afforded recognition to The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales under section 162 of the Irish Companies Act 1963, members of the Institute are therefore qualified to apply for appointment as public auditors.

Appointments will be for a period of three years from the date of such appointment, and application for renewal of appointment may be made before the end of that period.

The Minister has also decided to raise the fee which may be charged by public auditors for accountancy work, as distinct from auditing work proper, performed for these societies, from 2 guineas to 5 guineas per day of 7 hours (plus incidental expenses).

Advice for the Chancellor

LOWER and simpler direct taxes and more consultation is the message emerging from the Budget advice tendered by the Institute of Directors to the Chancellor of the Exchequer last week. Few readers of this journal will quarrel with the statement that 'the complexity of the legislation and the unintelligibility of parts of it is a tangle which the business world is spending far too much time trying to unravel and comprehend'.

Obviously impatient with the efforts of the Parliamentary draftsmen over the past few years, the Directors call for the setting up of a 'confidential forum of professional and business tax experts to explore new ideas on tax reform'. They feel that this would throw new light on tax problems and reduce much of the heat and resentment generated by the present procedure of producing 'instant taxes'.

On the long-term front, the Directors give their support to the setting up of a Select Committee of Parliament suggested by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, in particular, in their view, to examine such matters as the balance and composition of present taxes; the effect on new capital formation of the corporation tax system; the treatment of overseas income for corporation and income tax purposes; the effect of close company legislation on small trading enterprises; the introduction of a single personal income tax; the splitting of 'family' income; abolition of the difference between earned and unearned income; retrospective legislation, particularly about estate duty; the effects of investment grants and Government loans; and contractual savings schemes.

In another letter, submitted this time by the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, the Chancellor is urged to amend the legislation on close company taxation to withdraw the restrictions on the amount of directors' remuneration which can be deducted in computing corporation tax: and to stop the disallowance of interest paid by close companies on loans from directors. It also urges the adoption of a greater measure of uniformity and understanding by the tax inspectorate in applying the shortfall provisions. The ABCC is, in fact, preparing a paper for the guidance of close companies on this point.

The ABCC also recommends raising the threshold of income tax; broadening the ranges of the reduced rates; reduction of the rates, and raising the starting levels, of surtax; the taxing of both earned and unearned income at the same level.

Other recommendations include: the tapering off of capital gains tax over a period of time to offset inflation, and the exemption of minor transactions; the abolition of SET, betterment levy, tax on heavy oils and stamp duty on receipts and cheques. To meet the cost of these measures the ABCC presses, first, for cuts in public expenditure; secondly, the encouragement of national savings; and if these are not enough, a further shift to indirect taxes.

Control of Administrative Overheads

ANY methods which can help to improve the efficiency of office workers, increase the effectiveness of administrative systems and reduce clerical costs are increasingly the concern of the accountant whether as a manager or as an adviser. The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales is therefore holding a course on 'Controlling administrative overheads' – with material and speakers supplied by Binder Hamlyn Fry & Co – at the Hotel Metropole, Brighton, from February 22nd–27th.

The course will explain in detail the various techniques employed in clerical cost reduction. The three main approaches to work study in the office involve: work simplification – eliminating unnecessary work and duplication and also improving methods; work measurement – setting some standard of output as a basis for scheduling work and measuring productivity; and work control – improving the quality of the supervision and methods of allocating work and controlling performance, and so ensuring that the savings made possible by work simplification and work measurement are in fact achieved.

The course will also consider the related problems concerning personnel policies, motivation and management. At each stage there will be practical exercises which, together with the detailed notes provided, will enable those who attend to apply and further develop the necessary skills within their own offices.

The rapid growth in the number of office workers over the last fifty years has greatly increased the need to improve clerical productivity, and the application of method study and work measurement techniques developed in the factory can dramatically enhance office efficiency and reduce costs; in fact, savings of between 15 and 25 per cent can be expected. The annual savings normally comfortably exceed at least twice the cost of the investigation and the consequent changes and emphasize the value of the exercise.

The Institute's course will deal with the methods of improving the management and reducing the costs of clerical work in a way that is simple to understand and completely logical. It is designed to help the member in practice improve the service he can offer to his clients and the member in industry to develop his skills. The closing date for applications to attend the course is February 4th.

Need for a Management Audit

'THE root cause of the sickness of the joint stock company is the virtual abdication of the shareholders. By the time the shareholder has been alerted to danger it is generally several years too late', declared Sir Brandon Rhys Williams, Conservative Member of Parliament for South Kensington, speaking at a meeting of the London Branch of the Chartered Institute of Secretaries on Tuesday of last week.

The advance of technology and the spread of limited liability, he continued, had caused both management and shareholders to diverge so that they normally never met. The board of directors which used to exercise a supervisory interest on the shareholders' behalf had now been caught up by the management revolution. In the majority of companies the board now consisted mainly of the permanent heads of departments.

'The right remedy', Sir Brandon went on, 'is to find a way to encourage management to put its own house in order by stimulus from within the joint stock company itself . . . we can never bring the whole body of shareholders back into regular contact with the full-time managers: but we can hasten the growth of a shareholder substitute in the form of the management audit'. This would require the appointment of independent experts whose business would be to report directly to the shareholders over the heads of the board of directors, on the efficiency of their work and the soundness of their long-term plans. This was already done by accountants on financial matters and the agenda at even annual general meetings should contain an item 'consideration of the appointment of a shareholders committee'.

Replying to questions, Sir Brandon expressed the view that large areas of British industry were inefficient. There was plenty of talent in management but it was frequently being held down by the pyramid structure of the organization. This created frustration which continued right down through the company. 'The take-over bidder is not enough', said Sir Brandon. 'Too frequently he is the executioner, not the doctor. The change must come from within, if necessary with the help of legislation'.

Customs and Excise Year

THE annual report of the Commissioners of Customs and Excise for the financial year ended March 31st, 1968 (Cmnd. 3873, HMSO, 16*s* 6*d*), reflects the results of the heavy consumer spending generated in the aftermath of the devaluation. The total revenue for 1967–68 was £3,717 million – an increase of £177 million, or 5 per cent, on the previous year. This yield represented just over one-third of the revenue from central government taxation.

The higher yield was compounded by higher consumption during the year and also the imposition, in July 1966, of the regulator surcharge which was consolidated in the 1967 Budget. The major yields were derived from tobacco, with £1,043 million representing 27½ per cent of all Customs and Excise revenue. This compared with £969 million, i.e., 25½ per cent, from hydrocarbon oils. Purchase tax and the duty on alcoholic drinks were similar at £748 million apiece. Beer contributed over half the revenue from alcoholic drinks.

Among the less important duties, receipts from betting and gaming totalled £68 million. This would have been higher but for the fact that foot-and-mouth disease stopped racing for a period. Protective duties produced £214 million – an increase of some £35 million on the previous year – partly accounted for by the effects of devaluation.

The prevailing rates of tax not surprisingly encouraged some evasion. Civil litigation resulted in the recovery of nearly £5 million arrears of duty and tax, and 1,740 persons were convicted for various forms of evasion; but only 45 of them were sentenced to terms of imprisonment. Fines totalling over £90,000 were imposed by the courts.

Grants for Post-qualification Training

THE Social Science Research Council was set up by the Government following the recommendation of the Heyworth Committee on Social Studies. It is wholly financed by the Government and among its chief objects are the encouragement of research in the social sciences and the making of grants to students for post-graduate training in the social sciences.

In January each year, the Department of Education and Science authorizes the SSRC to offer a fixed total of new awards which may not be exceeded. Approximately 90 per cent of awards are distributed to universities on a quota basis. The remaining 10 per cent are allocated on a competitive basis to individual students. During February, university departments bid for the number of studentships they would like to offer. At the same time, applications from individuals specifying the post-graduate courses they wish to follow are analysed. In this way, an indication can be obtained of the demand for courses in specific subjects throughout the country.

In March, the SSRC divides the awards between subjects according to demand and distributes the major portion of them to university departments on a quota basis. The university departments then proceed during April and July to select students to fill the quota places. The remaining awards are allocated in August to September to those students who have decided at a late date to go on to post-graduate study. Nine hundred and five new studentships were awarded to begin in the autumn of 1968. Seventy-eight of these were for studies in management and industrial relations (including accountancy).

The studentships have a value of between £390 and £530 according to the circumstances of applicants and are not tenable for part-time study. In 1968, more than half the awards were for two-year courses. In many instances, the two-year awards are extendable to a third year on the recommendation of a head of a department.

Full details can be obtained from: The Secretary, The Social Science Research Council, State House, High Holborn, London WC1.

Holders of a professional accountancy qualification, whether they possess a university degree or not, may apply in the first instance to a university of their choice or direct to the SSRC by way of an individual application.

Training for Export Staff

A DOWN-TO-EARTH study of exporting functions and the training which needs to be associated with them is made in Training of Export Staff, a report published by HM Stationery Office (price 6*s* 6*d*) for the Commercial and Clerical Training Committee of the Department of Employment and Productivity. 'We believe', states the report, 'that proper training and the provision of adequate facilities for re-training are essential for a successful export trade; but we are bound to state that the present provision for both of us is deficient'.

In a foreword, Sir William Houghton, Chairman of the Committee, asks industrial training boards and other interested bodies to consider the recommendations and the problems which are set out, and to give encouragement to the development of export training on the pattern described. This is because the committee considers that 'inefficient slip-shod methods or the mistakes of untrained staff are often more harmful in exporting than other activities'. Examples are given as to how contracts can be lost through such slipshoddiness.

The report makes recommendations on courses and qualifications in exporting (including foreign language training). These involve day-release, block release, and even full-time study, and companies are also urged to review their own arrangements for training export staff. It suggests that there should be properly organized 'in-company' training.

At present, there appears to be a gulf between industry and the educational services, as in the view of the former some of the present courses are irrelevant to its needs. Action is called for at all levels of government, in training boards, educational establishments and company management for improvement in current export training facilities.

THIS IS MY LIFE

Not so Filthy Lucre

by An Industrious Accountant

THE lecturer was obviously doing his best. He had opened affably with a tasteful tribute to our great profession, cracked two rather good jokes, and launched fluently into his discourse. His audience, on the contrary, had been non-committal in reaction at first, frozen-faced later, and finally heatedly argumentative. It was rather a pity.

It was particularly ticklish for me, as the lecturer was Prinny, our personnel director, who by dint of insidious pressurizing had achieved an invitation to talk to our local accountants' group. His subject, he had indicated modestly, was one of absorbing interest to all those of financially-oriented talents; it would stimulate that keen investigatory probing which might well revolutionize our thinking; its fall-out might well prove the commencement of an intellectual pay-off.

True, his subject was thought-provoking. It was billed as 'Securing executive participation involvement-wise or motivating higher management's success-commitment'. He listed several possible aspects of the manager's job (and explained that accountants were, of course – but of course – potentially the managers par excellence) which normally should inspire them to the greatest effort, and then told us which aspect should mean most to us.

The listeners were just about as touchy as accountants could be at that ill-fated moment (there had been a somewhat heated dispute about 'future plans' at the preceding dinner) and they didn't like being told when they should rather have been asked. Further, they perceptibly stiffened when Prinny talked about 'manipulating' his subordinates, and the successful members resented hearing that they merely had 'potential'. To the chairman – a third-generation practitioner – personnel types are practically carpet-baggers.

Anyhow, Prinny unrolled a chart which showed what – or so some research psychologist had worked out – made the average manager tick. 'Recognition of his value' first, pontificated the great brain; then came sense of achievement, just ahead of 'pride in responsibility carried'; then there was 'demanding nature of work', followed by 'promotion prospects'. 'Security and salary' came last.

Our oldest member – a cross-grained type at his best – rose to comment that outside recognition was unimportant. True worth was not necessarily appreciated; prophets were still without honour in this country of ours; he disagreed entirely with the chart's sequence of the items.

A younger member in practice pointed out that he was conscious of a sense of achievement every time his trial balance agreed first shot, but that didn't pay the grocer's bill. Every taxation computation was demanding nowadays, to put it mildly, but what about an income for his wife if he was the victim of some hit-and-run rat? Besides, promotion was basically a synonym for increased salary in the case of accountants, who always work themselves to the bone regardless. That chart was just plain daft!

Prinny – not insensitive to the adverse reactions – puffed away profoundly at his cigar, eyes half-closed in what he meant to be quizzical tolerance, and threw back question for question. He was in a minority of one, however. His audience was almost unanimous. Not filthy lucre for its own sake – especially after the ravages of the tax vultures – they stressed with dignity, but for what it meant to their families. Central heating, a seaside bungalow, even the assurance of keeping the kids' heads above water . . . these meant more than salutations in the market place.

Personally, my private life holds all the responsibility, challenge and achievement that matter to me, and its happy continuance gives me all the motivation I need. Nevertheless, despite their protests, I wonder how many successful accountants, if offered double their present salaries would accept the commissionaire's or the filing-clerk's jobs and find satisfaction in the change?

The Auditor and Computerized Accounting Systems

by T. K. MULLIN, F.C.A., J.DIP.M.A., M.I.M.C., A.M.B.I.M.
and P. BELL, of P.-E. Consulting Group Ltd

WHEN considering the effect of computers on the role of the auditor, one recalls the old tag that no one knows how a successful fraud is perpetrated – only the unsuccessful ones are available for study. The use of computers has changed the face of accounting and introduced all manner of new possibilities for fraud, error and elimination, not yet fully recognized.

Whereas at one time it was thought that the auditor's role might diminish as a consequence of computerization, it is now seen that the opposite is true. The auditor is more necessary than ever, not only as a result of the increased opportunities for fraud, error and elimination already mentioned, but also of the need for external judgements as to the security criteria established within an organization to protect the system and its users.

Change in approach

Computers change the means of accounting but not the ends, so that the ultimate objectives of the auditor's work are not affected at all. What is affected is the whole approach to the audit programme and, in particular, the manner whereby end-results can be verified against the prime data and intermediate processing that produced them. Whereas in a conventional auditing programme, vouching and 'follow through' techniques could be patiently applied to a statistically sound sample of transactions, there is no comparable procedure in a computer system that can be relied on. As a result the auditor has to place heavier reliance on security and control mechanisms as such, than on specific checking opportunities on a stage-by-stage basis – though the latter are not abolished by any means.

It is thus clear that the auditor of a computer accounting system is acting in the role of consultant on the adequacy of the controls and systems installed. Any weaknesses in these will cast doubts on the validity of the statements produced from the system, and he may have to qualify his report accordingly.

To carry out this far-from-simple task, the auditor needs to be properly trained. In this context 'properly trained' means:

(a) knowing what controls and documentation procedures should exist in a well-run system;

(b) knowing the best way to control tasks rather than knowing intimately the tasks themselves;

(c) understanding systems flow and logic diagrams and being able to criticize these where necessary.

The framework of auditing practice requires to be adapted to cover the key problem areas in computerized systems. These are examined in the following paragraphs.

Planning the system

It is much more important than many companies realize that the auditor should be consulted at the preliminary design stage of a new computer system. This will help to establish the suitability of the system from an audit standpoint at the outset. If this is not done, the auditor may ask for the system to be re-designed at a later stage to rectify security omissions, and this could well be costly and time-consuming and lead to report qualification. In any event, the incorporation of audit requirements into the system by no means constitutes a burden to be carried solely to satisfy the auditor; proper audit requirements are always compatible with good data processing principles and practice. By their application many pitfalls and problems can be avoided. The term 'audit trail' here signifies a series of references attaching to data at intermediate stages of processing within the system. Such references enable the auditor to trace the transaction through the system, similar to folio and ledger references in a clerical system. The provision of audit trails is as important in computer systems as in clerical systems, especially where error recovery procedures are concerned.

Should a main file be found to have been corrupted it is essential – particularly in a complex integrated system – to be able to establish not only the generation or point in time when that file became corrupt, but also how many other files may have become corrupt as a result of using the same source data as the affected file or using data from the affected file itself.

Formal system of controls and standards

Some business activities are best left in a state of informality and flexibility for the reason that formaliza-

tion of routines and systems may have an inhibiting influence on performance. This is certainly not the case with a computerized process. Strict discipline and adherence to system are absolutely essential to ensure security against error and fraud. A system of controls must be established within the data processing department in such a way that responsibility for maintaining control can be allocated to persons having authority to take action in the case of non-observance.

Categories of control

The 13 categories of control most vital to the operation of the system are dealt with in later paragraphs. All of these control systems must be formally embodied in a series of written instructions, establishing standards for the management and operation of the data processing department. This written manual will be of great importance and value to the auditor. He will not only check the mode of operation of the system but will evaluate it against his own list of requirements and assess the status of the systems accordingly. The categories of control of most concern to the auditor are seen as:

1. Systems design

Systems designers should provide documentation in support of any of their systems as follows:

(i) a narrative description of the system in layman's terms;
(ii) a systems flow chart;
(iii) samples of source documents and printed output;
(iv) a description of the content and layout of main files;
(v) a description of the main processing steps;
(vi) detailed instructions describing procedures associated with the system;
(vii) a description of the controls which are built into the system;
(viii) a description of error conditions which may arise and the appropriate action to be taken;
(ix) procedures for keeping documentation up to date;
(x) arrangements for security of documents.

2. Systems control

Written instructions should be provided specifying the controls to be built into computer systems. By far the most important group of controls are those which relate to the input of data into a system. This is because at the input phase of a system:

(i) responsibility for operating the system is transferred from the user department to the data processing department;
(ii) errors are more likely to arise than at the computer processing phases of the system;
(iii) the accuracy of the processed results depends primarily upon the accuracy of the input data.

A batch control system, whereby controls which are established for each batch of source documents in the user department are reconciled with control totals established for the corresponding batch of prepared input in the processing department, enables both departments to check the accuracy and completeness of input data. These controls also prevent the insertion of unauthorized source documents into input batches, although a higher security requirement might necessitate the certification of individual source documents. Other controls such as format checks, range checks and check digit verification can be used to check the validity of input data.

Provision should be made for control totals to be passed and reconciled between the computer processing phases of a system. These totals should account for the differences between opening and closing balances and should appear as the printed output from the system. The reconciliation of control totals, both in input and during processing, should be made under program control and should not require operator intervention except when discrepancies are found.

Procedures for correcting errors in data will receive close scrutiny from the auditor. They should be clearly defined in writing and incorporate controls to prevent the entry of unauthorized data into the system. Data should not be entered into the system through the computer console.

Particular attention must be given to the controls built into on-line fast response systems. Because a variety of individual transactions requiring rapid turnround are normally input from a number of remote terminals, it is important that controls are applied which ensure that only valid transactions are accepted, and these only from authorized persons. All incoming transactions should be subject to data validity checks which may include a check that the transaction is accompanied by, or has been preceded by, a valid password. All transactions should be recorded on a 'journal' file, the contents of which may be subsequently printed out for inspection by the user department, or for audit purposes.

The majority of systems require data to be overwritten or erased at some point in time. This may occur as a result of summarizing transactions into a period-end total, or as a result of updating a direct access file. Before data is overwritten or erased, provision must be made to ensure that:

(i) recovery procedures can be implemented in the event of a system failure; and
(ii) the audit trail is not broken.

For the purpose of recovery it may be necessary to record data on a back-up file. Audit requirements may be better served by printing the data as a visible record.

Provision for recovery in the event of a system failure will be one of the auditor's foremost considerations in assessing the system. At least two previous generations of each main file, together with their associated transaction data, should be retained so that the current generation of the file can be reconstructed should it become damaged or corrupted. The same principle should apply to files which are updated by overwriting data, except that in this case two previous copies of the file should be retained, together with their associated back-up files.

The controls outlined above are necessarily only a selection of those which should be described in the systems design standard code of practice. They have been included to indicate the type of control with which the auditor is concerned and to demonstrate that audit requirements are compatible with the principles of good systems design.

3. Systems acceptance and modification

Once a system has been designed and before programming work commences, the user department should formally accept the system specification by signing a system specification acceptance form. Subsequent modifications to the system should be accepted in a similar manner.

4. Programming controls

Because of the disparity of programming languages and techniques which an auditor is likely to encounter in the data processing departments of different businesses, and because of the time and expense which examining individual programs would involve, he is more likely to concentrate on the controls exercised over the task of programming than on the content of programs. The auditor will be concerned to establish:

(i) the existence of proper program documentation;
(ii) the use of standard program controls; and, in particular,
(iii) the existence of procedures to prevent unauthorized modification to programs and program documentation.

5. Program documentation

As with systems documentation, written instructions should be provided specifying the standard of program documentation required. The documentation will include:

(i) a narrative description of the program;
(ii) program flow charts;
(iii) listings of program instructions;
(iv) descriptions of the controls which are built into the programs;
(v) detailed operating instructions describing computer set-up, operating and end-of-run procedures.

6. Program controls

Written instructions should be provided specifying the controls which should be built into programs. All controls which have been built into system specifications must be incorporated into programs. A program must be a strict interpretation of the system specification. Many of the problems encountered in the management of programming effort, and in the execution of programs, arise because programmers are allowed to pursue a liberal interpretation of the system specification.

Apart from the controls which are built into system specifications, additional controls which are essentially concerned with the operation of the computer should be built into programs. These controls will, for example, check that the correct files are being used and that data which should be preserved is not overwritten.

7. Program modifications

It is particularly important that control procedures provide adequate protection against the unauthorized modification of programs. This is because, if input control procedures effectively prevent the acceptance of unauthorized source documents or other forms of input, the only means of perpetrating a fraud is to modify a program. Modifications should, therefore, be authorized and accepted in writing by the user department. Programs and program documentation should be stored in a secure area.

8. System and program testing and acceptance

Once program writing has been completed, the written instructions which form the program should be independently checked to ensure that the program complies with the system specification and that it is free from logical errors. When the program has passed this test, it is run on the computer, where its structure and format are checked. At this stage test data are used to ensure that the program handles both valid and invalid data correctly. The auditor may decide to create an independent set of data with which to test the program and particularly its ability to handle invalid data.

On completion of program testing, the entire system will be tested using samples of 'live' data to ensure that clerical procedures, operating procedures and control procedures are all functioning as planned.

When the system has been tested and found to be suitable for operation, the user department should formally accept the operational system by signing an operational system acceptance form.

9. Operational control

Once a system becomes operational, it is generally accepted that the user department becomes responsible for the operation of that part of the system which involves clerical procedures, and for the processed results of the system as a whole. It is for this reason that all amendments to the system must be accepted by the user department. For this reason also, the user department should maintain a control account which records balances outstanding on the files held by the data processing department. Bulk postings, possibly in the form of batch control totals, will be made to this account and the resulting balances will be reconciled with the new balances produced by the processing department, as a result of processing the detailed transactions.

Within the data processing department the operational control function becomes responsible for the accurate processing of data submitted for input by the user department. Operational control receives input data from the user department, schedules work through the operating functions of the processing department, then returns the processed output to the user department. The relationship between the operational control and operating functions is similar to that between the production control and production functions of a manufacturing unit.

The auditor will be concerned to establish that within operational control:

(i) proper records are maintained; and

(ii) tasks are defined in writing and applied in practice.

10. Control records

Operational control should maintain records of:

(i) all input documents received, and their current state of progress;

(ii) all work processed, and the time taken;

(iii) all files, the storage devices on which they are recorded and their current location;

(iv) all operational programs and their current state of modification.

11. Control tasks

Written instructions should be provided setting out the standard code of practice for carrying out operational control tasks. These tasks normally include:

(i) scheduling and progressing work through the data processing department;

(ii) ensuring that the correct files and the correct program versions are used;

(iii) reviewing all printed output for quality and accuracy;

(iv) investigating and correcting errors;

(v) examining console messages to check that the computer has been correctly operated;

(vi) ensuring that back-up files are available for use in the event of damage to the current files;

(vii) ensuring that copies of all operational programs are available for use in the event of damage to the copies in current use;

(viii) controlling recovery procedures when programs or files are damaged.

If the computer is operated on a shift basis, the auditor should ascertain that hand-over procedures are established which ensure a proper division of responsibilities between shifts, both in operation control and in the operating function itself.

12. Operating

The operating function is responsible for the preparation of data for input, the operation of the computer and ancillary equipment, and the safe-keeping in a 'file library' of the file storage devices.

Data preparation controls

The preparation of data for input normally involves reading data from source documents and, by entering it through a keyboard, transcribing it into a form suitable for input to the computer. This operation is usually performed twice. The second operation verifies the accuracy of the first.

Written operating instructions should be provided for each operational system describing the procedures for carrying out these operations in detail. If verification is to be effective, the second operation should be performed by a different operator. The instructions should describe procedures for correcting errors detected during verification.

Computer operating controls

The auditor's prime concern with the operation of the computer will be to ensure that written operating instructions are provided both for the equipment and for each operational system, and that these instructions are carried out by the computer operator. It is good practice to design systems which require operators only to set up the computer prior to processing, and if processing is successfully completed, to carry out end-of-run procedures. Operator intervention during processing not only wastes computer time but could also be a source of error.

In cases where processing cannot be successfully completed, the run should be abandoned and operational control should be informed. Operators should not attempt to restart processing on their own initiative.

File library controls

A secure area should be set aside for the safe-keeping of file storage devices in current use and a librarian should be responsible for their issue, receipt and maintenance. Devices which are allocated to hold files should bear a visual identification to distinguish them from those which are allocated for use as temporary storage devices.

Storage devices on which back-up files are recorded for use in the event of damage to the current files should be stored in a separate area.

A record should be maintained of all files, the storage devices on which they are recorded, and their current location. This record will be the same as that used by operational control, and it is probable that in some cases the file library will be under the control of this function.

13. Administrative controls

The work of administration primarily involves the financial control of the data processing department. Whilst the auditor will certainly be concerned with this work, it is beyond the scope of this article.

Administration will also be responsible for ensuring that:

(i) access is restricted to areas within the data processing department, and particularly access to the computer operating area, the file library, the operational control area and the data preparation area;

(ii) facilities for the storage of computer stationery are adequate to prevent its unauthorized use;

(iii) stand-by arrangements are adequate to provide for the processing of priority work in the event of a major computer failure;

(iv) adequate precautions are taken against fire and other physical hazards.

(v) arrangements for the secure storage of systems and program documentation, back-up files and copies of programs are adequate to provide for recovery in the event of fire and other major damage to the data processing department as a whole.

The auditor should establish that security regulations are satisfactory and are strictly observed, and that the emergency arrangements are properly organized and have been tested in practice.

Conclusions

The introduction of computerized accounting throws additional burdens on to audit teams, both internal and external, but the key to successful audit practice lies in familiarity with the systems and their structure. The more disciplined and systematic the approach of the data processing department, the less opportunity there is for error or fraud. Within the data processing department itself, considerable collusion would be necessary to perpetrate a fraud with any chance of success. The task of auditing a computerized system presents new problems to the auditor familiar only with clerical systems but these problems are in no sense outside his range. The additional requirements, as with so many management techniques, are simply thorough training and familiarization.

Pricing Paradoxes

by E. J. BROSTER

FROM time to time somebody casts a stone into the smooth waters of orthodox belief and sends a series of ripples radiating from the centre of impact. When the swell subsides, everybody tends to return to the old orthodoxy supposing he ever left it at all.

Some time about October 1967, Dr Alfred Oxenfeldt, Professor of Marketing at the Columbia Graduate School of Business and a leading authority on pricing policy, cast a stone – or appeared to – into the unrippled waters of pricing orthodoxy by declaring that the economics of price is sometimes less a matter of unit cost and even of marginal cost than is usually supposed.

Whatever pricing strategy a seller may adopt, the marginal cost must necessarily play a large part in his calculations. He may decide to try to bankrupt a competitor by selling below cost, thus making a present loss in the hope of making a greater future gain. Even so, he must offset the present loss against the future gain to determine the net profit to be earned by such tactics, and to do this he must take account of the marginal cost in his calculations. In a case like this the seller presupposes that a price reduction will result in an increase in the demand for his wares.

This is the orthodox view: that a fall in price causes a rise in demand, and a rise in price causes a fall – other things being equal. But there are some people including, it seems, Dr Oxenfeldt himself, who hold the view that this is not invariably true: that with some products, the one sure way to increase demand is to raise the price.

Exploiting popular beliefs

The general idea of this school of heterodoxy is that popular beliefs are there to be exploited: 'you only get what you pay for', 'the only way you can judge quality is by the price', and so on. That there is something to be said for the idea there can be no doubt. Cases can be quoted where the demand for a new product remained in the doldrums simply because it seemed the price was too low to be believed, and as soon as it was raised the demand increased.

An empirical approach like this is not entirely satisfactory; and when it gives results that do not conform to theory, those results should be treated with reserve. It is not always possible to repeat pricing experiments on the same product in the same market more than once or twice. And repetition is often the only means of testing for the force exerted by other factors. Other factors can be more potent than price change: such as changing taste; the death of a competitor; the birth of a new one; the marriage of another with a retail group which may now deprive you of part of your shop window; a change in the impact of your own or your competitors' advertising.

There is, too, a limit to the price a man will pay for a drink in a pub for his wife or girl friend, or for a wax car-polish for his expensive shiny new car. Beyond this limit, the price-demand relationship must assume a course in conformity with orthodox theory: as the price rises further, the demand falls.

Marketing men refer to the effect on demand of a change in price as the 'price elasticity', as though it were the price that is elastic. Economists refer to it as the 'demand elasticity' or the elasticity of demand; or in a context concerning the elasticity of demand with respect to other factors – such as personal income, the price-level of substitutes and advertising, as well as price – they refer to it as the elasticity of demand with respect to price or simply as the price-elasticity of demand.

What is more, the economists have given us a means of measuring the elasticity of demand, which is of great practical value. It takes the form of a mathematical equation, such that it can form a constant in a simple algebraic equation expressing demand as a function of price; or in a more complex equation, or model, expressing demand as a function of price, total personal income, the retail price level, the price-level of substitutes, i.e. competitive brands, expenditure on advertising and other factors. Such equations bridge the gap between theory and practice, between economic concept and statistical analysis.

Of the factors in demand mentioned above, the seller has control over only two – his price and his advertising expenditure. The elasticities of demand with respect to these two factors are of inestimable value in pricing and advertising policy decisions. It should be added that although the elasticities with respect to the other – the environmental – factors appear to be of little more than academic value to the seller, those with respect to personal income and the retail price level are useful in market forecasting. However, all measurable factors in demand need to be taken care of in the fundamental demand equation used as the basis of a statistical analysis, so that those elasticities that are required by the seller shall be as accurate as possible.

The internal data required for a statistical analysis of market demand are usually recorded as a matter of routine by most firms, that is, the price, the quantity sold and advertising expenditure; and some environmental data are available in official statistical publications: personal income in the National Income Blue Book, the retail price index in the Annual Abstract of Statistics and the Monthly Digest of Statistics, and so on, all published by H.M. Stationery Office.

A method of correlation analysis should be applied to the data in order to determine the several elasticities of demand: least squares (sometimes called regression analysis), simultaneous equations, or cross-classification. The leading authority on the subject is Mordecai Ezekiel, and these and other methods of correlation analysis will be found in his work Methods of Correlation Analysis.

It is questionable whether economists' demand equations could be adapted to products for which a rise in price results in an increase in the demand. For practical purposes it is necessary to assume that the price elasticity of demand is constant for the observed range of prices. This is a reasonable assumption; at any rate, empirical studies show it to be so. Where demand behaves in an orthodox manner in response to price change, the elasticity of demand is said to be positive and it can range in practice from near zero for a staple commodity as a whole to 5 or 10 or higher for a branded product in a highly competitive market. Where it behaves in an unorthodox manner and increases when the price is increased, the elasticity of demand is said to be negative.

Inverted gullibility

It is generally supposed that negative elasticities of demand are limited to consumer goods. But instances can be quoted of negative elasticities of demand for capital goods existing for a time in limited markets. Two legacies of the Second World War consisted of (a) a large very efficient machine tools industry in the United Kingdom, and (b) a reduced home demand for machine tools resulting from the closure of munitions and aircraft factories. At least one manufacturer of machine tools, bent on expanding his market, went to the United States with a sample of his wares and a sheaf of specification leaflets and price lists. Potential buyers shook their heads. 'Oh, no', they said, in effect, 'your machines could not possibly be any good at that price'. Somewhat disappointed but nothing daunted he came home, revised his USA price list upward by an appreciable margin, returned to the States, and his sales there multiplied. And so even the American business man – noted as he is for his hard-headedness – can fall a prey to the price-quality myth.

An attitude of extreme suspicion like this can be described as inverted gullibility. Similar to it is the quite unjustified suspicion by which Stalin held his British and American allies during the war. The story goes that he asked the British for a supply of aircraft with wooden airframes, which were easier to repair in the field than metal aircraft. The British Command informed him they had two types of wooden aircraft, the Albemarle, then obsolescent if not completely obsolete, and the Mosquito, the most versatile and efficient aircraft of the time and one that made a major contribution to the Allied victory. The British Command strongly recommended the Mosquito. Stalin chose the Albemarle.

A hypothetical example of a demand schedule for a product with a negative elasticity of demand for the lower range of prices and a positive elasticity for the higher range will throw more light on the problem. Table 1 contains such a hypothetical example. It will be seen that demand reaches its maximum at 120 units for a price of £5 but that this does not correspond to the maximum sales proceeds, which amount to £640 for a price of £8.

HYPOTHETICAL DEMAND SCHEDULE

Price of product	Quantity sold in unit time	Sales proceeds (1) × (2)	Price-elasticity of demand
(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)
£	No.	£
1	10	10	Negative
2	40	80	Negative
3	70	210	Negative
4	100	400	Negative
5	120	600	Negative
6	100	600	+0·600
7	90	630	+0·778
8	80	640	+1·000
9	70	630	+1·286
10	60	600	+1·667
12	40	480	+3·000

Although charging the price of £8 would maximize the sales proceeds from the product, it does not follow that this price would maximize the net profit from it. The maximum profit depends upon the cost structure and more particularly the marginal cost. First, it is necessary to calculate the corresponding price, that is, the price that maximizes the net profit. This can be ascertained by applying the well-known optimum price formula, which states that the optimum price is equal to the marginal cost multiplied by the elasticity of demand all divided by the elasticity of demand less one. The formula applies to elasticities of demand in excess of unity, that is, in the hypothetical example, to prices over £8. For all negative elasticities of demand and positive elasticities up to unity, the corresponding prices invariably lie in practice below the optimum. For an elasticity of demand equal to unity, the corresponding price can be the optimum only where the marginal cost is equal to zero.

Optimum price

Where the elasticity of demand changes rapidly over a narrow price range as in the example, then a certain amount of trial and error is necessary to ascertain the optimum price, since in such circumstances only the marginal cost is constant. If it happens to be, say, £4, then the optimum price would be £10:

$$\frac{4 \times 1{\cdot}667}{{\cdot}667} = £10$$

One can calculate what the marginal cost would have to be to maximize the net profit for each price. The appropriate formula is price, less price divided by the corresponding elasticity of demand. Thus, for a price of £10 the maximizing marginal cost is:

$$10 - \frac{10}{1{\cdot}667} = £4$$

With a schedule showing price, elasticity of demand and the maximizing marginal cost, a change in the marginal cost can be accommodated in the schedule to determine the new optimum price.

In practice – if such a phrase can be applied to a hypothetical example like this – it is not always possible to calculate the elasticity of demand for each of a range of prices. It depends upon the availability of a certain constant, which in turn depends upon whether the basic data, observed or estimated, include one for the price that maximizes the sales proceeds. The constant is equal to the corresponding demand for this price divided by the price. In the hypothetical example the constant is:

The next step is to divide all the figures of demand (i.e. quantity sold in the period) by this constant and divide the answer into the corresponding price.

The proof of these propositions can be demonstrated by building up a net profit schedule showing the price, the sales proceeds, the quantity sold at the marginal cost, and deducting the latter from the former to give a column containing the net profit for each price. Table 2 contains the net revenue schedule for the whole range of prices in Table 1.

NET PROFITS SCHEDULE

Price	Quantity sold	Sales proceeds	Variable cost (2) × £4	Net profit (3) – (4)
(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)
£	No.	£	£	£
1	10	10	40	–30
2	40	80	160	–80
3	70	210	280	–70
4	100	400	400	0
5	120	600	480	120
6	100	600	400	200
7	90	630	360	270
8	80	640	320	320
9	70	630	280	350
10	60	600	240	360
11	50	550	200	350
12	40	480	160	320

The marginal cost of £4 is used for calculating the figures in column (4). This is the same as the marginal cost to which the appropriate formula was applied to give an optimum price of £10, with which, it will be seen, column (5) of Table 2 agrees.

All this may seem highly academic. For one thing, the elasticity of demand in practice changes only very gradually for price change – so much so, indeed, that to all intents and purposes it remains constant over most observed price ranges. However, where we have such a paradox as a negative elasticity of demand, anything can happen, and at the switch from a negative elasticity to a positive the change in the elasticity may b erelatively rapid, though not so rapid as in the hypothetical example demonstrated above. In any event an understanding of the academic approach to problems of this kind must always be of great assistance in framing pricing-policy decisions.

Real-life example

Recently a large chocolate manufacturing concern decided to test the market's reaction to a rise in its prices. The 6*d* bar was raised to 7*d* in the test area and with the use of a sophisticated technique the company came to the conclusion that sales by volume were reduced by 18 per cent as a result. Chocolate, especially a well-known brand, is not the kind of commodity that could have a negative elasticity of demand for any price range; and the company did indeed expect a fall in demand. We do not have the unity elasticity constant referred to above. Nevertheless, since we have two prices and the corresponding rates of demand, and can safely assume a constant elasticity of demand, we can calculate the elasticity of demand by applying the calculus of finite differences to the logarithms of these data on the basis of the formula:

$$-e=\frac{k-\log q}{\log p}$$

where e is the elasticity of demand, q the quantity sold, p the price and k is a constant. The calculus of finite differences is applied in order to eliminate k.

Suppose the quantity sold at 6*d* is 100, then the quantity sold at 7*d* is 82. Our complete data and the calculations are:

	p pence	q No.	log p	log q
	6	100	·7782	2·0000
	7	82	·8451	1·9138
Difference	.. .. ..		—·0669	·0862

$$\therefore -e=\frac{\cdot 0862}{-\cdot 0669}=-1\cdot 288$$

We have no knowledge of the marginal cost but we can calculate the implied marginal cost from the information we now have, on the supposition that the optimum price is first 6*d* and then 7*d*. The appropriate formula is:

$$a=p\frac{e-1}{e}$$

$$\frac{e-1}{e} \text{ is } \frac{0\cdot 288}{1\cdot 288}=0\cdot 2236$$

$$6\times 0\cdot 2236=1\cdot 342 \text{ pence}$$

$$7\times 0\cdot 2236=1\cdot 565 \text{ pence}$$

If we suppose the marginal cost is 1·565*d*, we can build up a net profit (or net contribution) schedule for a range of prices, and it should show that the net profit is maximized when the price is 7*d*. Table 3 contains the schedule and as it confirms that 7*d* is the optimum price, it can be said that the arithmetic in calculating the elasticity of demand is correct. The schedule also brings us back to our originally observed sales figures of 100 at 6*d* and 82 at 7*d*.

NET PROFIT SCHEDULE FOR CHOCOLATE GIVEN A MARGINAL COST OF 1·565 PENCE

Price	Quantity sold	Sales proceeds	Variable cost 1·565 × (2)	Net profit (3) – (4)
(1)	(2)	(3)	(4)	(5)
pence	No.	pence	pence	pence
5	126	630	197	433
6	100	600	157	443
7	82	574	128	446
9	59	531	92	439

The elasticity of demand provides a measure of the degree of competition in the market – the greater the competition the higher the elasticity of demand. For my part, I should have thought that the competition in the retail chocolate market in Britain would be rather greater than an elasticity of 1·288, and could be as high as 2·000. An increase in price from 6*d* to 7*d* would, for an elasticity of demand of 2·000, result in a fall in the quantity sold of about 27 per cent compared with the observed fall of 18 per cent.

It is worth mentioning that as the prices used in the analysis are the recommended retail prices and include retailers' margin, the marginal cost, too, should include the retailers' margin as though the retailers serve as the producer's agents. This being so, the implied marginal cost of 1·565*d* appears to be on the low side of the true figure. The higher the marginal cost for a given elasticity of demand, the higher is the optimum price; and the higher the elasticity of demand for a given marginal cost, the lower the optimum price. These two propositions can easily be verified by reference to the formulae given above.

Decimal Currency Adviser Appointed

THE appointment of a special adviser on the task of changing to decimal currency in the Republic of Ireland, has been announced by the committee set up by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland.

He is Mr Edmond Grace, F.C.A., company director and adviser, who was awarded the Gold Medal of the Irish Institute when he qualified in 1943. He has held senior management posts in engineering, the cinema business and in public transport. In 1951 Mr Grace studied American business with an eleven-nation OEEC team which published the best-selling report, Cost Accounting and Productivity.

Mr Grace is engaged in the preparation of a programme of action for the committee, to develop a network of members in every line of business and in every part of the country to work to complete the link to and from national level which the committee provides. Plans are already advanced for a programme which will provide for a regular survey of members' progress towards the change-over.

NEW ZEALAND

'Chartered Accountant' Designation for Society Members

MEMBERS of the New Zealand Society of Accountants are to be designated 'Chartered Accountants' as from July 1st next, following the passing of the New Zealand Society of Accountants Amendment Act 1968.

The Amendment Act implements proposals by the Council of the Society, subsequently supported by Government, for the adoption of a single classification for all members. Until now the designations 'Public Accountant' and 'Registered Accountant' have been used to differentiate members in public practice and those in employment.

With the adoption of the new designation, members of the Society will be using a term of greater significance among accountancy bodies overseas. The change will also abolish a distinction between members based solely on the mode of practice and eliminate confusion in the public mind about the present designations.

Under the new classification structure all members will use the designation 'chartered accountant'. Those in public practice will be issued with a 'certificate of public practice' and the conditions under which such a certificate will be issued are to be prescribed in the rules of the Society. The intention is that persons admitted to membership after July 1st, 1971, will be eligible for a certificate of public practice if they have been members of the Society for not less than two years and have had not less than two and a half years' acceptable experience in the office of an approved chartered accountant in public practice.

Apart from membership classification changes, the Amendment Act includes provision for the establishment of post-qualification divisions within the Society. The first division to be established under this provision is the Cost and Management Accounting Division, membership of which is available to Society members who pass an examination course and satisfy appropriate practical experience requirements over and above those required for membership of the Society. Members of the division will use the designation 'Cost and Management Accountant', and the designatory letters 'C.M.A.'. (From our New Zealand Correspondent.)

UNITED STATES

More Blessed to give . . . Tax-free

IN a country where charitable gifts are immediately deductible from the tax base, the Christmas season (which happens to coincide with the end of the tax year) has always brought forth a spray of comments on how giving can be rewarding as well as virtuous. The recent festive season maintained the tradition. In addition to the usual accountancy columns, many enthusiastic amateurs offered their advice. The Oracle – published by a prosperous New Jersey parish – had its contribution on the art of giving taken up and prominently reprinted in the Christmas issue of the Newark (New Jersey) diocesan newspaper.

The truth propounded by The Oracle (and by other, more humdrum, sources) was that capital gains become totally tax-free if handed over to a church or other charity. All that was needed was for the recipient agency to buy stock from the donor at his original price, then sell the stock at current market price and realize a tax-free long-term gain. Admittedly, the donor was out of pocket to the extent of this gain, but under the American tax system, up to one-half of it would have been cut off by the tax authorities if he had realized it on his own account. Moreover, the full amount of the gain foregone provided a deduction from his taxable income. On a short-term gain (held by the donor for less than six months) The Oracle pointed out that 'the benefits are even greater'.

Although corporations are the source of very large gifts (and often have a senior executive who spends most of his time handling them), this procedure is too ingenious to have a strong following outside the ranks of individual taxpayers. For a corporation, a major preoccupation at Christmas time concerns ways of rewarding the staff without involving them in additional tax claims. The Christmas bonus remains highly acceptable to employees of professional and financial firms, some of whom receive as much as the equivalent of 25 per cent of their yearly pay as a year-end extra. But their gratitude cools when they realize that the gifts will be taxed at their full marginal rate. Industrial psychologists have even come forward with the theory that these gifts may develop into a source of disappointment rather than pleasure.

As a tax-free alternative, the Christmas party has much to recommend it. For the large corporations, with stockholders looking jealously over management's shoulder, a staff dinner or children's pantomine has become an expensive rarity. Smaller, privately-held companies and partnerships sometimes still stage these events but, in general, their place has now been taken by trade association parties and annual conventions – usually held well away from the Christmas season.

Government Bargain that Got Away

MR LEON HESS, once a fuel oil dealer in suburban New Jersey and now listed by Fortune as one of the richest men in the world, has taken over where the British Government left off. About two years ago his company bought the UK Government holding of nearly 10 per cent of the shares of Amerada Petroleum – a major oil producer in the United States and Libya and gas producer in the North Sea. With this and other disposals, the Government has at last completed the liquidation of its wartime nest-egg of American shares, which in 1967 added nearly £200 million to Britain's foreign exchange reserves. Mr Hess has exercised his stewardship quite otherwise. As 1968 ended, he announced that 'substantial agreement' had been reached to merge his company and Amerada into a new and much more powerful integrated group.

Such grandiose plans would doubtless not have been feasible for the British Government, even had it retained the shares that it sold for nearly £42 million to Hess. But the recent jump, by more than 25 per cent, in the price of Amerada shares could have been most welcome news for the British balance of payments position. As the result of the merger, the Government would have found itself owning a stake in a group with a combined turnover of $645 million (nearly £270 million) and after-tax earnings equivalent to nearly £34 million – of which Amerada alone accounted for three-quarters.

It is too late for the British taxpayer to do more than shed a tear for the profits that his Government might have made. But investors still have time to learn from this lesson – and are evidently taking advantage of it. The latest official figures show that American shares are now being sold to private investors abroad in net amounts totalling £750 million a year. British investors and investment trusts are known to be among the most active contributors to this flow of purchases, which has increased tenfold within the last three years. Those outside the sway of Government wisdom seem agreed that now is the time to hold, not sell, American oil and other securities. (From our United States Correspondent).

Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity v. Swift Travel Services Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Queen's Bench Division)
December 2nd, 1968

(Before the Lord Chief Justice (Lord PARKER OF WADDINGTON), Mr Justice ASHWORTH and Mr Justice WILLIS)

Selective employment tax – Refund – Air transport company – Services at airport – Whether part of airport's activities – Evidence inadequate – Rehearing ordered – Selective Employment Payments Act 1966, section 2 (3) – Minimum list headings 706, 709.

The respondent company performed air-handling work at an aerodrome. Its tasks included supplying chocks and steps, supplying an engine for ground power to work water bowsers, supplying water bowsers and organizing refuelling.

The Industrial Tribunal decided that the company's activities were within minimum list heading 706; and that it was entitled to a refund of selective employment tax.

Held: the evidence was not sufficient to decide whether the company's activities were an integral part of the activity of an airport; and that the case should go back to the Industrial Tribunal for a rehearing.

Pritchard v. M.H. Builders (Wilmslow) Ltd

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
December 10th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice CROSS)

Income tax – Loss claim – Carry-forward of loss – Business passing from old company to new company – Whether trade belonged to same persons before and after transfer – Finance Act 1954, section 17.

A company, Milton Hindle Ltd, was incorporated in 1955, and carried on the trade of builder and decorator. It entered into unprofitable contracts with Peterlee Development Corporation and incurred losses of about £400,000. In 1960 an accountant was instructed to prepare a statement of affairs of the company, and this showed a loss of some £430,000 as regards the members, and a deficiency of £24,000 odd as regards preferential creditors.

In view of this insolvency it was difficult to interest shareholders of the old company in attending meetings, and in November 1960, all the issued shares in the old company were transferred to the accountant and his partner in order to facilitate the passing of a resolution to wind up the old company.

The old company went into voluntary liquidation on December 1st, 1960. The liquidator induced Peterlee Development Corporation to alter the terms of the contracts, and on April 17th, 1961, the corporation entered into an agreement with the old company to enable the work to be started again under the contracts.

In March 1961, the appellant company (the new company) was incorporated with a capital of 100 £1 shares, 99 of which were subscribed for by the old company. On October 27th, 1961, the accountant and his partner were appointed the first directors of the new company, and at a meeting on January 26th, 1962, of the new company it was resolved to purchase the goodwill, assets and benefits of contracts of the old company, and on the same day an agreement therefor was made between the two companies.

The formation of the new company and the subscribing for its shares by the old company was with the intention that the new company should acquire the trade of the old company in the hope that the losses of the old company could be set against the profits of the new company; and that the shares of the new company should in due course be sold for the benefit of the creditors of the old company. The committee of inspection of the creditors of the old company were aware of the reasons for the formation of the new company and the subscriptions for its shares, and they raised no objection.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant company that the transfer of the trade from the one company to the other did not bring about any change in the class of persons who were interested in the trade; and that the new company was entitled to have the losses of the old company set against its future profits. It was contended for the Revenue that section 17 of the Finance Act 1954 was not applicable. The Special Commissioners decided in favour of the company.

Held (reversing the decision of the Special Commissioners): the persons entitled to the profits of the new company were not the same as the persons entitled to the profits of the old company; therefore section 17 of the Finance Act 1954 was applicable, and the losses could not be carried forward.

Day v. Williams

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
December 11th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax – Back duty – Private hotel – Whether fraud or wilful default – Whether neglect – Income Tax Act 1952, section 47, proviso – Finance Act 1960, section 51.

The taxpayer conducted a private hotel in Manchester and also let furnished lodgings there. The Inspector took the view that the taxpayer had understated his profits, and a number of assessments were made on the taxpayer. Three of the assessments, namely, those for 1953–54, 1954–55 and 1955–56 could be maintained only if either the proviso to section 47 of the Income Tax Act 1952, applied, or if there was neglect by the taxpayer within the meaning of section 51 of the Finance Act 1940.

The taxpayer appealed to the General Commissioners, and they decided that there was 'neglect, tinged with wilful default' on the part of the taxpayer, and they accepted the capital statement put in by the Inspector subject to two minor corrections. The stated case did not record the giving of leave, under section 51 of the 1960 Act, for the making of the assessments for the three years above mentioned. The Revenue did not contend that the finding that there was 'neglect tinged with wilful default' was a finding of wilful default.

Held (with regard to the three assessments above mentioned): the taxpayer could mention the question of leave to the Court again at any time before the end of January 1969, if he was not satisfied that leave had been given under section 51 to make those assessments.

George J. Smith & Co Ltd v. Furlong

In the High Court of Justice (Chancery Division)
December 12th, 1968

(Before Mr Justice Cross)

Income tax - Company – Payments to directors – For loss of office – Directors' decision – Concurrent sale of outgoing directors' shares – Whether sums deductible in company's computation.

The appellant company carried on business as an advertising agent, and the managing director was Mr Lipkin, who died in 1951. In 1956 Mrs Lipkin became a director of the appellant company, and in 1957 and 1959 respectively Mr Frank True and Mr David Hazard became directors. In the latter year Mrs Lipkin was elected chairman of the board of directors, and Mr True was appointed managing director. By agreements made in 1961 each director was appointed a life director at a salary of £5,000 a year, and the articles of association were altered to make a director irremovable without his consent. On the same day there was a further agreement that the company should make a bonus issue of shares; and that Mrs Lipkin and Mr True should renounce parts of their allotments in favour of Mr Hazard. As a result the issued capital became 3,000 shares; and of that Mrs Lipkin held 1,015 shares, Mr True 995 and Mr Hazard 990.

In 1962 disagreements developed among the directors over Mrs Lipkin's work as book-keeper, the position concerning a substantial contract managed by Mr Hazard, and a reduction that had been made in Mr True's remuneration. Negotiations between them ensued, and resulted in Mrs Lipkin and Mr Hazard agreeing to sell their shares to Mr True and resigning as directors, and that compensation should be paid to them for loss of office. On September 10th, 1963, in pursuance of these agreements, Mrs Lipkin and Mr Hazard transferred their shares to Mr and Mrs True for £3,000. At an extraordinary general meeting on September 30th, 1963, attended by Mrs Lipkin, Mr True and Mr Hazard, it was unanimously resolved that the company should pay £5,000 to Mrs Lipkin and £500 to Mr Hazard as compensation for loss of their offices as directors. They then signed a document resigning as life directors.

The company claimed to be entitled to deduct the £5,000 and the £500 in computing its assessment to income tax for 1964–65. The General Commissioners decided that the company had failed to establish that these sums had been wholly and exclusively expended for the purposes of its trade.

Held: the General Commissioners' decision was correct.

Filing Space Saved with Microfilm

WITH a sales accounts department holding over 100,000 individual customer files, Beecham Products (UK) were using about 5,250 sq. ft of office space and employing a staff of 25 to carry out filing. However, by microfilming the bulk of the department's paperwork, nearly 4,000 sq. ft of space was released and staff were reduced by more than half.

The paperwork commences with the combined order form/delivery note which is produced by the computer in readiness for each individual customer's order. It is then supplied to the salesmen in advance of their routine calls, who add details of the order, and the forms then pass to the distribution department for delivery of the goods. The forms are then sent to head office and details are fed into the computer from which the invoices are produced.

An average of 31,000 documents a week are filmed through a 16 mm. flow camera, and after they are developed they are loaded into cartridges which hold up to 2,000 documents. Although only 4 in. square, each cartridge also carries an index of the invoice numbers to which it refers.

Documents are held for ten days before microfilming as any delay in their arrival might cause them to be filmed out of numerical sequence. After they have been filmed, they are held for two months for reference in order to facilitate the settlement of queries.

To retrieve a microfilmed invoice, the relevant cartridge is selected and clipped into one of the 3M reader-printers; the indexing counter will then indicate when the required document is approaching. If a print-out is required, a full-size copy is delivered within six seconds of pressing the appropriate buttons.

New GPO Stamp-vending Machines

FIVE stamps, side by side, will be issued by a new type of vending machine which the Post Office is introducing this year.

Developed in readiness for decimal currency, it will take one shilling or 5*p* and issue a strip of stamps in the order of 2*d*, 2*d*, 3*d*, 1*d* and 4*d*, and for present values of postage rates will give three divisions into the 4*d* rate or two divisions into the 5*d* rate.

After D-Day (February 1971) by a simple change of the stamp roll, it will issue decimal value stamps and will need no mechanical changeover; it will therefore not be out of service during this period.

Further machines will be introduced during the next two years to replace all existing stamp vending machines.

Simons & Co

IN his statement with the 1967–68 accounts of Simons & Co Ltd, Mr John E. C. Simons, chairman and managing director, apologizes for the delay, compared with previous years, in sending shareholders the accounts and in holding the annual meeting. The meeting was held on January 31st, and Mr Simons says that the time taken to collect all the additional information which the new Companies Act demands put the company 'on the wrong side of Christmas for printing'.

The accounts show an 'extremely disappointing result' coming after good trading in 1966–67. Mr Simons details some examples of Government action during the financial year under review through which the company and other members of the fruit trade suffered. The business of the Simons group covers the importing, wholesale selling and distribution of fruit and vegetables.

Last winter the Board of Trade increased the quota for imported apples by one-third. 'This action', Mr Simons comments, 'no doubt ensured cheaper supplies of apples for the British public but at the same time made imports of apples unprofitable in spite of the fact that we had taken the precaution of obtaining foreign currency for most of these purchases before devaluation.'

Government policy

During the same period – i.e., between devaluation and the March Budget – the Chancellor of the Exchequer allowed spending on durable goods to continue and in Mr Simons's view 'a big increase in hire-purchase agreements between Christmas and Easter undoubtedly left less money to be spent on such items as fresh fruit and vegetables'. Government economic policy also had an adverse effect on some of the company's customers, and the company, in common with others, suffered bad debts in every market in which it operates.

Recently-available figures show a further rise in consumption of what are called 'convenience foods' at a time when generally the sales of the company's produce have remained static. Mr Simons considers that 'far more should be done in the way of publicity and advertising so that the public are constantly reminded of the pleasures of consuming fresh fruit and vegetables whilst not forgetting its health-giving properties'.

The fruit trade as a whole is still shouldering the burden of selective employment tax without any way of passing any of this on to its customers, although the National Federation has made repeated representations to the Government. Another Government factor affecting costs was the 50 per cent increase in Road Fund licences which cost the company an extra £5,000 in addition to the higher duty on diesel oil for the vehicles.

New markets

Earnings were also affected 'by an unexpected and substantial loss' in one of the subsidiaries but, unfortunately, the chairman does not state the extent of the loss or the reasons why it was suffered. The group loss has been more than compensated by recovery of taxation and the profit resulting from the sale of the major part of the holding in Simons & French Inc. In the notes to the accounts it is explained that the original cost of these shares has been recovered over the years and the proceeds of the sale represent a profit in the books.

A small holding in the company is retained but it is not considered prudent to place any value on it as the company's future trading is unpredictable. The major change in the balance sheet is the increase in properties caused by further payments in connection with a new market at Newcastle, additions to premises in Middlesbrough and the acquisition of two market outlets in London. Bank overdrafts rose as a result but will be substantially reduced by sale of Glasgow property when the new market opens.

The chairman emphasizes that the board's plans for the development of the company are essentially long term and are continuing. Higher trading profits are anticipated for the current year, and a continuing improvement in the future as all the branches reflect their full profit-earning potential.

Turnover

Turnover, it will be seen from the accounts, is shown for the first time. In the original the profit and loss account and balance sheets are presented with ruled lines under every item right across the page. This may help the eye to a certain degree but, since all figures are shown in the same type, there is no emphasis on sub-totals or, in fact, on any total figure at all.

The report does not include any running record of past results and reading the unruled notes against the ruled accounts suggests that the rulings are more of a distraction than an aid. Even taking the new Companies Act requirements into account, the presentation of one year's accounts just over a week into the second half of the subsequent financial year is not exactly in the realm of prompt reporting.

Part of the problem is that the company operates at a number of market centres and the current development programme probably causes some complications. Now that the new Act's requirements have been, as it were, written into the annual reporting operation, the company ought to be able at least to get back to the right side of Christmas for printing. In 1967 the accounts were published on December 7th, with the annual meeting held on December 29th.

5. TAXATION
There is no liability to tax on the profit on sale of the trade investment as it is covered by losses brought forward from previous years. This, together with the loss on trading, means that there is no liability to corporation tax based on the results of the year.

Losses for taxation purposes amounting to approximately £47,000 (subject to agreement) are available to be set-off against future profits.

As far as the directors are aware the close company provisions of the Finance Act, 1965 do not apply to the company.

6. PROFIT DEALT WITH BY PARENT COMPANY
In the accounts of the parent company group profit has been dealt with to the extent of £32,487 (1967 £35,441).

CITY NOTES

FULL-YEAR figures from the unit trusts show graphically the extent of the flight from fixed interest savings into equity savings in 1968. Net new investment in unit trusts totalled £258·5 million and, quite apart from being far and away a record for the unit trust movement in any one year, the figure can be placed against the mere £83·2 million attracted in 1967 and the previous record of £105·4 million in 1966.

Naturally enough, in a year of such record attraction and record growth (the value of trust funds rose by £628·7 million to £1,482·4 million) unit trust managers are not exactly being slow to reinforce success. This year so far has seen a long strong string of new tap offers and it is not merely the combination of last year's record and New Year hope that convinces most people in the unit trust industry that 1968 will only prove a record for a year.

Last year, it is generally held, was the year when unit trusts finally broke through to the 'small investor' public. Not all managements are modest enough to admit that the mistrust of money created by devaluation and subsequent governmental mismanagement of the economy opened the way to the break-through.

In Stock-market terms, unit trusts must continue to be an extremely strong equity-supporting influence. There will come a time, admittedly, when the top trust of the year will be judged by the smallest shrinkage rather than the largest growth but unit trust managements are convinced that 1969 will certainly not be that kind of year.

THE main theme in the statements from the leading bank chairmen this year must be the injustice of the severity of the restriction imposed on bank lending. There will be general agreement with the view that, when restrictions are of an extent that banks must, over a defined period, stop banking in so far as they have to demand a reduction in their customers' borrowing levels, there 'ain't no justice'. But that will not absolve the banks from having to meet the ordained end-March situation.

From the latest clearing bank figures it would seem that the banks have two months in which to reduce their lending levels by something approaching £150 million. The impression is that because they considered the task far too onerous, as well as unjust, some banks have failed to get to grips with the job of reducing lending to the levels ordered in last November's directive. The result is that pressure will have to be put on the banking system to an inordinate degree in the next two months. The Bank of England has made it quite clear that last November's directive meant what it said.

* * * *

HILL SAMUEL's acquisition of the Noble Lowndes group of life assurance and particularly group life assurance and pension businesses, is yet another indication of the need that financial organizations feel to be fully represented over as wide a sphere of the financial world as possible. Hill Samuel's move is complementary to their acquisition last year of Lambert Brothers, the insurance and agency organization.

The clearing banks feel this need just as much as the merchant banks and, as a result, the distinction between the clearing and merchant banks is becoming gradually more blurred. Westminster has been operating its own effective merchant bank for some years, and the other major banks are linked one way or another with merchant banking concerns – Midland with Samuel Montagu for example.

* * * *

THE First National Finance Corporation's bid for the Bowmaker credit and finance group is a reminder that it is eleven years since the banks moved into hire-purchase finance. Bowmaker became one of the chosen hire-purchase finance vehicles of Lloyds Bank. There is now a suggestion that insurance may be the next clearing bank development point, particularly since unit trust links have brought the banks into contact with the life assurance industry. Unit-linked life assurance, however, may grow sufficiently enough on its own account to satisfy banking needs in this direction.

Correspondence

Integration of the Profession

SIR, – As a CA who has lived and worked overseas for some eighteen of the last twenty years, I would like to support the observations of 'R.K.' (December 14th issue) on the subject of overseas students.

I dealt with this subject at some length in an article published in The Accountant of August 26th, 1967 – 'Management accounting in emerging territories' – readers who are interested may care to refer to this. The problems are not, however, confined to any one branch of accountancy, but affect the profession as a whole in overseas territories. With particular reference to the Caribbean, for example, those who are members of 'integration status' bodies have taken the lead in setting up local associations for which the admission requirements and standards of ethics are in no way below those of parent bodies. Many of our members, despite intense pressure of work, devote time and energy to training and guidance of bona fide students who may be expected to qualify for the internationally respected senior associations or institutes. The Commonwealth Foundation and the Commonwealth Development Corporation are also active in this field and every effort is made to co-ordinate these activities.

It is feared that the effect of the present proposals as regards overseas students might be to negate the efforts of the people who, with local knowledge and professional loyalty, have worked to maintain the respect and prestige of the senior bodies within the newly-independent territories. The senior bodies of the profession have a duty, both to their own members overseas and to the profession as a whole, to encourage and assist those who are trying to preserve the tradition and standards upon which generations of qualified accountants have prided themselves. Weakening of the profession anywhere in the Commonwealth, weakens it by association everywhere, and none of us wants that.

Would it be too much to suggest that before integration provisions affecting the profession overseas are imposed, the matter be thoroughly gone into with representatives of the profession familiar with overseas conditions, and with the organizations from which valuable co-operation is already being received.

Yours faithfully,

E. H. WALMSLEY, F.C.A., J.DIP.M.A.

Barbados, West Indies.

SIR, – In recent months your journal has published a number of letters written by members of the ICA, and expressing their opposition to integration. With a few notable exceptions the majority of such letters constitute mere value-judgements, based on irrational grounds and usually saturated with emotion. Accordingly, I do not intend to waste my time and your space in refuting these somewhat insular pieces of correspondence.

There are several topics on which I should like to comment, but I shall content myself by drawing attention to one or two facts of accounting life which appear to have escaped the notice of our separated brethren in the chartered commercial body. I am anxious to point out, however, that the ensuing paragraphs are not addressed to the progressive element in the ICA, which regrettably appears a minority, but rather to the larger, misguided group of individuals who commence their daily routine by staring into the nearest mirror and repeating several times:

'Mirror, mirror, on the wall,
Show me the best accountant of all.'

In the first instance, it should be noted that The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants, founded in 1885, is a chartered body whose members are entitled to use the designation 'chartered' as of right. It should be superfluous to add that membership of the chartered municipal body demands the highest qualities of integrity, competence and professional expertise – a fact evidenced by a total corporate membership of less than 5,000.

Turning now to the student societies which function under the aegis of the chartered municipal body, we find:

Between seven and ten lectures per session being held in each area, the best 16 being printed and distributed nationally.

A students' publication, Telescope, is also available, comprising technical articles written specifically for students by experienced practitioners drawn from a variety of fields.

In addition, study booklets are prepared especially for student purposes and designed to cover the more abstruse facets of the Institute's syllabus, e.g., education finance, management principles and techniques.

Model answers and research studies are available to members of the students' society, whilst short courses and pre-examination courses are held periodically.

Regrettably, the publications mentioned above do not contain such invaluable contributions as 'Eighteenth Century English Furniture' (pages 14–16, Young Accountant, September 1968)!

With the introduction some years ago of higher entry requirements (five passes including two 'A' levels), a separate paper on management, and the introduction this year of another paper entitled 'Analytical techniques' (including management mathematics), the gap between the IMTA and ICA could hardly be wider. In fact, I would go further and suggest that integration with the much larger ICA, whose lamentable record in the field of professional education reflects an archaic and antediluvian attitude to studying, can only retard the progress already achieved and seriously impede the future growth of student facilities.

At this point, it might be pertinent to question exactly what the ICA has to offer on integration – except stagnation. Next, I should like to examine the peculiar theory propounded by the ICA Council that the qualities of independence, objectivity and impartiality can only be obtained by service within a practising accountant's office (paragraph 86 of the 'scheme') and, as a corollary, those mere mortals in the industrial and public sectors who desire elevation to the exalted status of an objective, impartial professional must spend, after qualification, a further 30 months within the confines of a practising accountant's office. This theory is quite ludicrous, as the following two examples illustrate:

The decision of A.-G. v. De Winton (1906) unequivocally places the treasurer of a local authority in a fiduciary relationship with the ratepayers (third parties) and demands so high a level of independence and objectivity that, in the final analysis, the treasurer must place his fiduciary duties to the ratepayers above those to his employer – the council.

The second case, of the district auditor, is equally glaring. Are we really expected to believe that this highly trained professional auditor (who may well be a member of the chartered municipal body) conducting both a judicial and financial review of an authority's activities, is devoid of objectivity and impartiality? As for qualities of independence, an extract from page 11 of The Law Relating to District Audit (C. R. H. Hurle-Hobbs) appears most apposite:

> 'The District Auditor functions entirely independently of the Minister who appoints him. As Mr Chamberlain said when he was Minister of Health, 'They are not my auditors – they are entirely independent of me. It would never have been any use, had I sought to influence a district auditor in carrying out his duties. As a matter of fact, the action of the District Auditor has often been the cause of some embarrassment.'

Before proceeding, I should like to make it unambiguously clear that I am not taking issue with the need to develop such special qualities or the need, for example, to acquire technical expertise in a particular field before expressing a professional opinion. But to suggest that within the periphery of a practising accountant's office there dwell an elite possessing a monopoly of independence, objectivity and impartiality is illogical, grossly impertinent and tragically confirms the departure of ICA theories from the realms of fact and their arrival in the land of fiction.

I have already questioned what benefits (if any) will accrue to the IMTA on integration with the ICA. I would like to conclude by suggesting that the ICA have far more to gain from integration generally as this presents a golden opportunity to recapture the 'glory that once was Greece'. For out of the cold ashes of integration there will surely emerge a hybrid Phoenix-like creature manifested by a new, glittering ICA, resplendent with the accumulated expertise, kindly contributed by the IMTA, ACCA and ICWA.

We are told that past and present achievements are no answer to the demands of the future and that a unified profession is the first step in the right direction. Agreed! – and therefore I have no hesitation in supporting any prospect of integration with those two other progressive and forward-looking bodies, the ICWA and ACCA, whose members I hold in the highest respect.

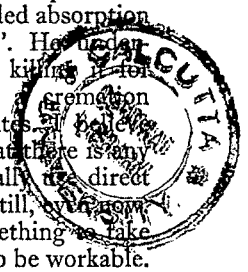
Yours faithfully,

Cardiff. MICHAEL POWER.

Business Planning

SIR, – I would like to thank you for the informed and constructive review of my book, Business Planning (The Accountant, November 23rd). Perhaps you will allow me one or two comments – starting with an admiration of your reviewer's prose style, even though it is not 'crisp' either.

I wish I could agree with him that I had killed absorption costing 'stone dead in the first few pages'. He underestimates its stamina, because I have been killing it for years without any noticeable effect; even a cremation would merely show its Phoenix-like attributes. I believe that not more than one firm in ten knows that there is any other system, while the number which actually use direct costing for any purpose whatever is smaller still, even now.



Killing is not enough; there must be something to take its place and that something must be shown to be workable. Three purposes which I have separated into three chapters – the third of which is only for adepts and enthusiasts. Certainly it is a lot of pages, but it is not too many to give the chief executives who have to do the sums an accounting language which will not persist in misleading them.

This implied audience – the chief executives of the multitude of smaller firms – supplies the reason why I chose to write the book the way I have rather than in one of the 100 other ways. The chief executives need to be shown that corporate planning is not just another big company technique, but is one which they can and must use themselves. And it has been my experience that once people of this calibre have been shown the right paths, they can go down them with no difficulty. They do not need advice on what your reviewer calls the 'pools of darkness', even though he will find many of them illuminated in reflected light; what they do need is a handful of straightforward ways of coming to some sort of conclusion on grounds better than 'hunch'.

Much the same remarks apply to my having put the 'tool' part first. A fighter does not go into the ring until he is properly armed with the techniques of attack and defence and with the reflexes to use them without stopping to think; no-one has the time to acquire these skills while the battle is in progress. On a less picturesque plane, I felt I should properly have been accused of holding up the action if I had put them bang in the middle of the planning process.

To some degree I think I can say that the book has stimulated your reviewer to raise more of the curtain which shrouds business planning. If my book stimulates even some of its readers, who come new to the subject, to think productively (or, better still, critically) about these problems it will have done its job, and I shall rest reasonably content with my new child.

Yours faithfully,

Dorking. D. R. C. HALFORD, O.B.E.

The Rat Race

SIR, – The ICA's recent advertisement – presumably intended to attract suitable young men into the profession – proclaims in heavy type 'the Chartered Accountant's life is out of the rat race'.

What sort of an image is the ICA trying to build up? Every young man with any go in him should be itching to get into the rat race, not looking for a safe niche to opt out of it. This is one of the main troubles with the ICA. Too much effort and time in Institute circles is devoted to demarcation disputes and restrictive trade practices aimed at producing an outdated, non-competitive atmosphere.

These essentially trade union activities are, of course, more commonly referred to in professional circles as ring fences, integration, and professional conduct or ethics.

This is not the way to encourage other bodies to integrate with the ICA, or young men to join us.

Yours faithfully,

London. A. W. HOWITT.

Decimal Currency and Prices

SIR, – I wonder if Mr Moses (Notes and Notices, January 18th issue) is correct when he declares 'that the cost of living need not rise as a result of the change to decimal currency'.

We in the United Kingdom have already experienced a form of inflation when some years ago the ¼*d* (roughly £·001) was withdrawn. That automatically meant that any price increase could not be less than ½*d* (£·002).

In the new currency – £p – the minimum increase is going to be 1·2*d* (£·0041) double the current rate.

The Treasury has stated that the ½*p* will in due course be withdrawn leaving the minimum increase 2·4*d* (£·009). One has only to look at the hard currencies of Europe:

Country	Currency	Approximate Sterling value	Divided into
		s d
France	franc	1 11	100
Germany	mark	2 2	100
Sweden	Kr.	1 8	100

to realize that our ultimate smallest unit is too large.'

The £p system has inbuilt inflation by the Treasury. If the £-mil. system had been used this would have meant that any increase would have taken place at a much more gradual pace than 2·4*d* and, indeed, in certain retail markets might have encouraged price reduction.

Yours faithfully,

Edinburgh. J. L. S. VEITCH.

Because of its pertinence to the observations of our correspondent printed above, and to our own comments in the leading article on other pages on the new White Paper, we reproduce the following letter from The Times Business News of last Tuesday. – Editor.

SIR, – The policy of the White Paper 'no rise in prices for decimals' is like beating the air. There are two main reasons:

(1) To vendors of large numbers of small-priced articles, rounding prices down represents a substantial reduction in profit margins which they cannot afford.

(2) Innumerable small restraints on inflation are released.

In Australia, for example, the prices of milk, newspapers, telephone calls and many bus fares all went up against the official conversion table. To compensate for the increased cost of living in the first full quarter under decimals, an increase in the basic wage of £1 per week, was required. It had been many years since the last increase of this magnitude had been required.

In New Zealand the effects were less, partly owing to the depressed state of the economy at the time, but similar effects were noted and there were (it appeared) a number of anticipatory increases, postal rates being an example. Moreover, on decimalization, the second-class mail rate was not reduced in accordance with the official table but an anomalous half-cent stamp was introduced instead, despite the absence of a half-cent in the coinage.

In both New Zealand and Australia, within a few months of decimalization, trading bank charges were increased by a third. One might imagine that had decimal currency any real benefits to offer they would be most evident in banks (whose whole business, after all, is dealing with money) and there might have been some reduction in charges to be expected. It is difficult to see how the people of Australia or New Zealand could have 'had the blood' of those responsible for these increases as the White Paper alleges.

The blunt fact of decimalization is that Britain is being compelled to conform and will pay the cost.

Capital Gains Problem

SIR, – The following capital gains problem has quite recently arisen and I should be grateful to know if any of your readers has met this point before.

A shareholder in a well-known public company was provisionally allotted further shares in ratio to his present holding. In the offer it was stated that any shareholder not wishing to take up the shares or sell the rights would receive the surplus, if any, when the issuing house sold the shares after the offer had lapsed. The shareholder did not take up the shares nor did he sell the rights. In the event he received a cheque being the net surplus on the sale of the shares by the issuing house.

What is the position as regards capital gains? The shareholder did not sell them – in fact, he ignored the offer entirely. That there was surplus was in reality chance. Had the market been otherwise there would have been no profit. In other words, the shareholder was a mere spectator. Does he have to return this sum in his income tax return, and if so, how does he describe it?

I have read the explanatory notes issued by the Inland Revenue (No. 560–1966) and various treatises by sundry authorities and do not find any clause or paragraph that covers this rather unusual case.

Yours faithfully,

J. E. BIRCHALL, F.C.I.S., F.A.C.C.A.

Sale of Land

SIR, – The views of readers on the following points would be appreciated. A client with one principal place of residence proposes to sell part of the land belonging to it. Would the gain, if any, be liable to capital gains tax? Could the proceeds of the part sold be set off against the original cost and the principal place of residence be said to cost £x, or would the part sold have to be valued as at the date of original purchase and deducted from the sale proceeds?

Yours faithfully,

T. S.

Reviews

Palmer's Company Law

Twenty-first edition edited by CLIVE M. SCHMITTHOFF, LL.D., Barrister-at-law, and JAMES H. THOMPSON, M.A., LL.B., Barrister-at-law.

Stevens & Sons. £9 17*s* 6*d*.

The first edition of this authoritative work appeared 70 years ago in 1898 and the present edition under review is the 21st. Thus by a neat numerical coincidence, Palmer may be said simultaneously to have come of age and to have reached its allotted span. These landmarks, however, relate to human beings and not to textbooks of which this is what might be called a perennial specimen.

The principal changes are those necessitated by the new Companies Act of 1967, notably an entirely new chapter on directors' reports. Among other topics given a chapter to themselves for the first time are those dealing with the Protection of Depositors Act of 1963 and the inspection of company books and papers. Chapters largely rewritten deal with, inter alia, the rule in Turquand's case, debentures, take-over bids and winding-up. Additionally, case law references understandably have been much expanded.

The present editors have been greatly helped in this considerable task by Mr S. J. S. Eley, F.C.I.S., who revised the practice notes, Mr P. V. Sclaverand, A.C.A., who re-wrote the chapters on accountancy, and Mr John S. Hall, M.A., LL.B., who was responsible for the chapters on taxation. It is a tribute to both editors and contributors that the whole has been put together so harmoniously that it might be the work of one individual – as it was originally 70 years ago.

Green's Death Duties

Second (cumulative) supplement to sixth edition by J. E. REDMAN, LL.B.

Butterworths. 12*s*.

In this supplement which brings Green up to date as at October 1st, 1968, there are 42 pages of text and 10 pages of new legislation. Mr Redman devotes a page to section 36 of the Finance Act 1968 concerning gifts in consideration of marriage and another page to section 37 dealing with gifts as part of normal expenditure. Section 38 of the 1968 Act (aggregation) is an extremely difficult one and Mr Redman gives it three pages. This reviewer would have liked more, though part of the exposition includes a sentence of more than 120 words, which on any test is too long. Apart from the new legislation, there are useful notes on recent decided cases which underline the point that estate duty law continues to be full of surprises.

Cost and Management Accountancy for Students

Edited by J. BATTY, D.COM.(S.A.), M.COM., A.C.W.A., M.I.O.M., M.B.I.M.

Heinemann Ltd, London. 55*s* (paperback 30*s*).

Dr Batty modestly claims only to have edited this collection of articles culled from the pages of The Cost Accountant and Management Accounting over the years (it is, in fact, stated as being published in association with The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants).

Certainly, the selection and positioning of the articles is very well done; it is logical and the 'Contents' are so explicit that the student can turn to the matter of his particular interest at once.

The book is not really about cost accountancy as many readers would recognize it at all: it is really about accounts for management in all its aspects. It is true that much is written in fairly simple terms about costing principles and terminology, but it is emphasized throughout that the main purpose is understanding and control at all levels of management.

It is difficult to fault the book as an excellent introduction for students not only to principles but also to the philosophy of management accountancy. In the section dealing with standard costing the importance of work study is stressed, and this is divided into method study and time study. Then there are sections on budgetary control, marginal costing, controls (including audits), accounting records, capital expenditure appraisal, introducing shares to the Stock Market, productivity, statistics and financial management.

The student will, in fact, get a grounding of much he will meet in greater depth in his other, fuller textbooks, and indeed it should make those other books far more easily understood when he meets them later in his studies.

ICWA Entertains 'Hardy Heating' TV Team

MEMBERS of the BBC Television team involved in the production and presentation of the Hardy Heating Co management accountancy series on Sunday mornings were guests of The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants at a luncheon at the Institute's headquarters in Portland Place on Tuesday of last week.

The Institute has every reason to feel pleased about the new series, for this cost and management accounting television presentation coincides with the Institute's Jubilee Year. The ICWA regards the series as a particularly well-timed recognition of its pioneering work in this specialized and predominantly industrial sector of accountancy.

The term 'management accounting' gained currency in accounting and business parlance in 1950, when a specialist team of managers and accountants, sponsored by the Anglo-American Council on Productivity, went to the United States on a two-month fact-finding tour. The team was led by Mr Ian Morrow, C.A., F.C.W.A., a member of the ICWA Council, who later was one of its youngest Presidents. (Mr Morrow is now a prominent industrialist and is a member of the Panel of Judges of The Accountant Annual Awards.)

In the team's report management accounting was defined as 'the presentation of accounting information in such a way as to assist the management in the creation of policy and in the day-to-day operation of an undertaking', and subsequently the subject of advanced management accountancy was introduced into the ICWA examination syllabus.

The 'hero' of the new dramatized series is John Marsh (played by Harvey Hall) who is described in the Hardy Heating Co booklet as 'both a chartered accountant and a cost and works accountant'.

Among those present at the luncheon were: Mr Graham Turner, BBC Economics Correspondent, who provides a concluding commentary to each episode in the series; producer Paul Ellis and members of his team; actors Harvey Hall, Raymond Mason, Alethea Charlton and Frank Mills; Mr Morrow, Mr L. N. Norton, F.C.W.A., and Mr W. S. Risk, B.COM., C.A., F.C.W.A., members of the Council of the Institute; and Mr M. H. Walters, C.B.E., Secretary of the Institute, and members of his staff.

Right: Mr Ian Morrow (centre) with Miss Alethea Charlton ('Jean Wilkins' in Hardy Heating) and Mr Graham Turner, BBC Economics Correspondent.

MP's Comments at Southampton Dinner

AN unintelligible hotchpotch to the layman and a hotchpotch to many accountants, was how Mr Mark Woodnutt, MP for the Isle of Wight, described tax legislation when he spoke at the annual dinner of the Southern Society of Chartered Accountants on Thursday of last week at Southampton.

Mr Woodnutt, who was proposing the toast of The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, thought the Institute should establish its own committee, with experts from banking and industry, to advise the Government. He applauded the efforts made by the Institute in trying to persuade successive Chancellors of the Exchequer, of whatever party, to simplify and reform the fiscal system. The select committee which the Institute had suggested as a long-term measure, and the short-term measures in the form of a memorandum submitted to the Chancellor in association with allied bodies, were measures the Chancellor should take.

Ill-considered

The present laws and machinery for assessment of income tax had been built up over the last one and a half centuries. In the last four years, a vast volume of ill-considered legislation had been added. 'It is an unintelligible hotchpotch to the layman, and a hotchpotch to many of you in the profession', Mr Woodnutt added.

'How many of you could advise me on the many problems and interpretations of the 1965 capital gains tax? We have to wait to go through the slow process of litigation before we know what it means.'

But the Chancellor did not accept the Institute's view about simplification and reform, and had said that he did not think a select committee was the answer. Therefore, said Mr Woodnutt, the Institute should set up its own committee, and invite on to it experts from the banking profession and industry. This would enable them really to get down to the problem and they could then tell the Government what it should do.

Early in 1967 he wrote to the Secretary of the Institute suggesting such a course of action. He was surprised to receive a reply informing him that it was not the Institute's function to advise on the economic and political fields of taxation.

Think again

'If this is the case, then I think that you, as an Institute, should think again', he said. 'I think you have a duty to advise the Government in the national interest. You are the practical economists of the country. You can advise far better than chaps from the universities in their wigs and gowns. You know all the complexities in tax matters and you know how adversely our cockeyed system and penal tax rate is affecting the British public. The country is sick, and it needs your help.'

Replying to the toast, the President of the Institute, Mr Stanley Dixon, M.A., F.C.A., said Mr Woodnutt had thrown out a stimulating challenge. Like Mr Woodnutt, Institute members were aware of the intricacies and problems of taxation but he thought the answer which the Secretary gave in 1967 would still be the answer today. If such a committee were set up – with the object of telling the Government what to do – he wondered how much notice the Government would take of what the committee told it.

The Institute believed it was for Parliament itself to do this job. That was why they had suggested that the proper body to look into the question, from top to bottom, was a select committee of Parliament.

Dedicated

This select committee would have the power to take evidence from everybody concerned and the Institute would not be slow in coming forward with all the evidence at its command. Mr Woodnutt's challenge would not be forgotten; it would be taken very much to heart. Like him, they were keen and dedicated in every way to ensure that the taxation system was made simpler and much more sensible.

He sometimes thought they were slow to consider the indirect cost of new taxation. A new tax was thought up and an attempt made to estimate its yield; but he wondered if an attempt was ever made to estimate the cost of the host of civil servants who had to be employed to administer it. Nor was an estimate made of the cost in terms of the burdens such taxes imposed on members of the profession. Probably the greatest cost was that they, as members of the accountancy profession, became so obsessed and involved with taxation that they were unable to equip themselves as they should. They should have time to make a positive contribution to management, instead of having to spend so much of their time in the purely negative task of settling taxation liabilities.

Whittle down

Furthermore, taxation came into matters of policy. A company board decided on a line of policy it wished to take in the interests of itself and the community. Then, they had to call in the tax expert to see what the effects of taxation would be. Too often, that which was best was whittled down to something which was second-best, simply because of the effects of taxation on what a policy ought to be.

Mr Dixon said he understood the Government's desire to achieve fairness between one taxpayer and another, but even this could go too far. In their attempt to stop up every loophole and make sure no single taxpayer benefited over another, they imposed a tremendous strain for very little benefit on practising members of the profession.

Mr F. W. Bright, F.C.A., President, The Southern Society, in the chair, proposed the toast of the guests, and the Town Clerk of Southampton, Mr Gordon Guest, M.A., LL.B., responded.

SILVER MEDALLIST OF THE INSTITUTE OF COST & WORKS ACCOUNTANTS

CALCUTTA UNIVERSITY CENTRAL LIBRARY

Distribution is neglected by cost accountants. Costing started in the factory and unfortunately has remained there, in spite of the fact that the expenditure incurred on transferring goods (including marketing and selling them) has increased substantially since costing was invented.

This book is designed to remedy this omission. It is written for students – particularly cost accountancy students – and tells them in an introductory way, how to account for distribution costs and prepare cost accounting statements for distribution managers.

Tax Claim Defeated

PERHAPS the most notorious section in the Income Tax Acts is section 28 of the Finance Act 1960. Its next rival must be section 412 of the Income Tax Act 1952 which counters tax avoidance in relation to overseas income.

In one vital respect section 28 is less onerous; tax cannot be levied under it unless and until the Inland Revenue make a specific direction. Section 412 simply imposes tax and therefore requires the victim to show the deemed 'income' on his return form. The trouble is that the victim may be utterly unaware that he is a victim. Everyone is presumed to know the law but nobody really understands the complexities of section 412.

There is all the more reason to rejoice, therefore, that the House of Lords last week upheld the decision that section 412 was ineffective to impose tax in Herdman v. CIR (46 ATC 264). Mr Herdman lived in Northern Ireland until 1949 when he acquired an estate in Donegal, a few miles over the border. He owned the issued capital of a Northern Ireland company (NI); then, in 1951, he caused another company (RI) to be incorporated in the Irish Republic.

He sold to RI the share capital of NI and certain other property in consideration of an issue of shares to himself and an issue to his son's trustees, together with some £77,000 cash which was left outstanding but was payable to him by RI on demand. This move was carried out to avoid tax in the Irish Republic but not to avoid any United Kingdom tax. The Crown attacked this transaction as a 'transfer of assets' within the meaning of the preamble to section 412, as indeed it was.

In consequence of that transfer, RI became entitled to substantial dividends from NI from which United Kingdom income tax was deducted but which in effect was repaid by being applied in discharging RI's tax bill in the Republic. At all material times, Mr Herdman dictated the policy of RI. It paid no dividends but each year it discharged part of the debt owing to Mr Herdman, to an aggregate of over £15,000 over six years. In 1953 Mr Herdman moved back to Northern Ireland and thereafter was resident and ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, as well as in the Republic.

The Inland Revenue raised Case VI, Schedule D assessments on him for the years 1953–54 to 1957–58 in respect of RI's income in those years. The Revenue argued as follows:

(b) by virtue of (a) income became payable to RI;

(c) RI was resident or domiciled outside the UK;
(d) RI's accumulation of its income and its payment of outstanding purchase money to Mr Herdman were 'associated operations';
(e) by means of the transfer and the associated operations Mr Herdman acquired 'rights';
(f) by virtue of the 'rights' Mr Herdman had 'power to enjoy' the income of RI.

Mr Herdman argued that he escaped section 412 because of subsection (3) (a), i.e.:

> 'that the purpose of avoiding liability to taxation was not the purpose or one of the purposes for which the transfer or associated operations or any of them were effected;'

The Special Commissioners accepted that 'taxation' here was confined to United Kingdom taxation. In consequence, they also accepted that avoiding taxation was not the purpose of the transfer by itself. They held, however, that the accumulation of profit by RI, and the managing of RI assets that funds were available for Mr Herdman to draw on, constituted 'associated operations' and that these operations 'afforded the appellant, in the most simple and direct way, power to enjoy the income of' (RI). They held that Mr Herdman had not satisfied them that these associated operations were within subsection 3 (a).

This seemed a formidable chain of reasoning but counsel for Mr Herdman broke it in the Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland and again in the House of Lords. Their submission that the operations described were not 'associated operations' failed but a second submission succeeded. As indicated above, the power to enjoy in (f) must be by virtue of 'rights'. Subsection (1) begins:

> 'Where such an individual has by means of any such transfer, either alone or in conjunction with associated operations, acquired any rights by virtue of which he has . . . power to enjoy . . . .'

Counsel for Mr Herdman argued that Mr Herdman gained his power only by virtue of the transfer, without the conjunction of the 'associated operations'. Consequently, the transfer was the only relevant transaction to consider, it was unnecessary to consider what the object of the associated operations was. Accordingly, if the transfer was saved by subsection 3 (a), then section 412 (1) was excluded.

The Court of Appeal in Northern Ireland accepted this submission and discharged the assessments (46 ATC 264). The Inland Revenue appealed to the House of Lords, but the appeal has failed.

In the House of Lords the Revenue conceded that section 412 (1) could not apply unless Mr Herdman had, by means of the associated operations, acquired rights. Lord Reid said he could not see that Mr Herdman acquired any right at all by means of those associated operations. By means of the transfer of the NI shares to RI he acquired two rights: he acquired shares in RI and he became an unsecured creditor of RI for the £77,000. Neither right gave him any right in or to particular assets of RI. The way in which RI dealt with its own assets did not alter either of Mr Herdman's rights. When he received sums of money from RI he did so in right of his position as creditor, and he held that position by virtue of the transfer. When RI carried forward profit without distributing it as dividend, Mr Herdman's rights as a shareholder were not increased or altered. The other four lords of appeal concurred in dismissing the Revenue appeal.

A significant observation in the House of Lords was, according to The Times of January 30th, that 'a creditor's rights are not altered when a debtor saves or spends his income'. This is to be distinguished from the case of Ramsden v. CIR (36 ATC 325), where the taxpayer had sold property to an overseas company and had left the purchase money outstanding.

The overseas company accumulated its income instead of paying off the outstanding purchase money. Nevertheless, the taxpayer was deemed to have power to enjoy the income of the overseas company, in that the accumulation of income increased the value to the taxpayer of the debt owing to him by the company. This rested on subsection 5 (b) which provides:

> 'An individual shall, for the purposes of this section, be deemed to have power to enjoy income of a person resident or domiciled out of the United Kingdom if . . .
> (b) the receipt or accrual of the income operates to increase the value to the individual of any assets held by him.'

Reverting to the Herdman case, one of the submissions on behalf of the taxpayer was that since the taxpayer was not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom at the time he made the transfer, the section could not apply to it. This was rejected on the ground that it would open a loophole to an individual who was contemplating returning to the United Kingdom from abroad and who therefore sold his assets to an overseas company, leaving the purchase money outstanding so that he could draw it in the United Kingdom instead of income as such.

This leaves unanswered the interesting question which arises where a settlor abroad wishes to settle overseas assets on individuals resident in the United Kingdom. Having been advised that such a settlement would otherwise involve the resident in United Kingdom tax, the overseas settlor decides to create a settlement under which from the beginning the English individuals are entitled only to capital sums. Seeing that immediately before the settlement nobody is liable to United Kingdom tax on the income of the assets proposed to be settled, and that the settlement confers no right to income on the English beneficiaries, it would be arguable that section 412 was avoided.

Inland Revenue Report

HARD on the heels of the Comptroller and Auditor-General's report on the Inland Revenue with the Civil Appropriation Accounts (noted in The Accountant last week), has come the Commissioners' own report on their activities in the year ended March 31st, 1968 (Cmnd 3879, HMSO 25*s*). As usual it is an extensive quarry of useful and significant information and runs to nearly 250 pages.

The corporation tax introduced in 1965 is now well under way and produced over £1,214 million in the year under review. It is estimated to produce £1,426 million in the current year. Total assessments made in the year 1967–68 were 272,300, of which 169,300 were on close companies and 103,000 were on what the report engagingly calls 'open companies'. These figures compare with a total of 223,900 in the previous year, of which 132,600 were on close companies.

Although there are so many more individual assesss-ments on close companies, it was the open companies which produced the lion's share of the tax: nearly two and a half times as much as that produced by close companies.

Further statistics are now available in respect of companies' accounting periods ended in the year to March 31st, 1966. There were 176,800 cases of which 44,000 produced no net trading income. Another 34,900 had profit less than £100 and earned between them £700,000 in net trading profit. At the other end of the scale an insignificant number of companies made profits exceeding £2 million each but between them they earned £772 million out of a total aggregate net trading income of £2,359 million.

Turning to personal incomes, some comparative figures show that whereas for 1965–66 there were 200 individuals with a total income each exceeding £100,000, in 1966–67 this number had gone down to 109 – little more than half. It is estimated that, when further adjustments are made, the final figures for 1966–67 will show not more than 100 individuals with incomes exceeding £100,000. These figures are taken from the surtax statistics. There is also a survey of personal incomes of 1966–67. The results of the survey have been analysed by the Revenue's Leo III computer which permitted elaborate methods of correction to be applied by special programs. The report points out that in order to avoid Schedule F tax, companies in general made very heavy payments of dividends in 1965–66, with a consequent temporary falling off in this kind of income in 1966–67. There is the usual deficiency of wives' earned incomes as reported by husbands; perhaps many wives have earnings without their husbands knowing. After tax incomes of £10,000 or more were enjoyed by only 500 people.

In line with the fall in the number of surtax assess-ments of £100,000 and upwards, the number of people having incomes of £20,000 and upwards before tax fell from 7,300 in 1965–66 to 6,300 (counting husband and wife as one). Here again, no doubt the panic payment of dividends before April 6th, 1966, had much to do with this. Another 32,800 had incomes between £10,000 and £20,000.

It would not be appropriate to leave personal taxation without drawing attention to the fact that of the £765 million post-war credits which were credited to individuals for repayment after the war, the huge total of £188 million was still unpaid at the end of March 1968, some 23 years after the war was over. No compensation is being made for the heavy fall in the value of money over that period, quite apart from the two devaluations which have taken place. The whole business had been a cruel deception on the part of successive Governments. Rather less than £15 million was repaid in 1967–68.

Capital gains tax and betterment levy, with their complicated provisions for valuations at various dates, conjure up a picture of a people making their living by valuing each other's property. Even in the realm of estate duty, which has not substantially changed, the number of valuations for Great Britain increased from 80,042 in 1966–67 to 84,885 in 1967–68. Valuations for stamp duty in connection with voluntary dispositions fell from 12,784 to 12,031, but in respect of the new capital gains tax and short-term gains tax, the number of valuations in Great Britain which was only 5,096 in 1966–67 rose to 23,505 in 1967–68. The aggregate valuations arrived at increased from £67,500,000 to a staggering total of £279,200,000.

As the report points out, the amount of capital gains tax produced is not directly related to the total valua-tion. Moreover, the higher the valuation made now, the greater the 'base' value on the occasion of the next disposal. The cost of valuation may well, in a great many cases, come to much more than the tax.

The report does not bring out the fact that for disposals after March 1967 betterment levy and capital gains tax run in double harness, with elaborate pro-visions against overlapping. One tax is assessed by the Inland Revenue with head office in London; the other is levied by the Land Commission with offices in Newcastle.

Pensions Plans and Prospects

FOR all the talk of an affluent society in Britain today, there are still some pockets of poverty. The largest is to be found among the aged and retired. Over seven million people now draw State retirement benefits and there are a further 850,000 who although well over retirement age are not eligible for this benefit. Nearly a third of all these people are dependent, in some degree, upon supplementary assistance.

As the number of retired persons in the community rises – it is now over eight million, and by 1980 it will exceed nine million, i.e., a 12½ per cent increase – so the cost of providing pensions must rise. Furthermore, the costs are increased by the need to provide successive generations of pensioners with living standards comparable to those enjoyed by the working population. According to last week's White Paper, National Superannuation and Social Insurance (Cmnd 3883, HMSO 6*s*), the new proposals for earnings-related social security will involve an increase in the costs of pensions from £1,717 million in 1972–73, the year in which the proposed scheme will start, to £2,760 million by 1992–93.

The history of such projections of financial commitments has been unhappy. In the past two decades the Exchequer has found itself meeting a continuously increasing shortfall between contributions and expenditure in the State pensions scheme. From the economic point of view, this is less important than the official view that benefits should be directly related to contributions. In 1961 it was necessary to introduce what was then described as an earnings-related pensions scheme, primarily for the purpose of raising more funds to meet the then shortfall in revenue.

The scheme now proposed aims ultimately at providing, on average, rather less than the once promised half-pay on retirement. Whereas, for the lowest paid and for widows, the benefits will represent somewhat more than half average pay (equal to about £11 a week at April 1968 levels), for the highest paid workers, benefits will tend to be proportionately less.

Thus, a formula will give 60 per cent of average earnings up to half of the present average national earnings of £22 per week, with 25 per cent of higher earnings up to a ceiling of one-and-a-half times the present national average earnings, equal to about £33 per week. There is to be a biennial review of the benefits to take account of any increase in the cost of living.

Over 4½ million women are now gainfully occupied, the proposed plan recognizes the need to incorporate them into the scheme. Married women's earnings will be aggregated with those of their husbands to determine the pension payable on retirement. They will also receive the same sickness and unemployment benefits as men, with the same earnings. Wives who do not work outside the home will be covered by the husband's pension, and it is gratifying that the pensions of widows are to be brought up to the husband's full rate.

Full details have not yet been worked out, more especially in respect of the readjustments needed to ensure that the new scheme will fit in with the existing structure of occupational pensions. On this issue the Government has made two important points, the first being that they wish to encourage private occupational pension schemes and, second, that they propose to ensure that pension rights will be preserved when an employee changes his job.

The principle of contracting out has been accepted by the Government but the implementation of this concession has to be discussed. Since private schemes will offer better terms than the new State scheme, the attractions of opting out are considerable. There is no doubt that this concession will create considerable difficulties and there is a real danger that in the attempt to enable employees to contract out, the finances and provisions of the new scheme will be adversely affected.

Whereas some critics of the present trend in the Welfare State would argue that the individual should rely upon the private occupational scheme with supplementation – where needed – from the State, the new proposals offer the reverse. They offer a 'substantial basic compulsory scheme' with relatively standardized provisions which can be supplemented by a private scheme adapted to members' requirements.

A significant aspect of the scheme is the proposed employee's contribution equal to 6¾ per cent of earnings up to £33, although only 4¾ per cent will be used for pension benefits. Compared with the present male employee's National Insurance contribution, this is almost £1 per week extra. By 1972–73 the impact may be less marked but it is possible that there will be pressure to shift the cost of the contribution back on to employers through higher wages.

Furthermore, while there is almost universal satisfaction that the new scheme will protect the pensioner against post-retirement inflation, the implications of this provision seem to have been overlooked. This is, in fact, the first occasion on which any post-war Government has provided even tacit official recognition that inflation is here to stay.

Future Plans

THE following joint announcement was issued this week by The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales, The Institute of Chartered Accountants of Scotland, The Institute of Chartered Accountants in Ireland, The Association of Certified and Corporate Accountants, The Institute of Cost and Works Accountants and The Institute of Municipal Treasurers and Accountants:

Proposals for the development of the accountancy profession

Local meetings to discuss the proposals for the development of the accountancy profession in Great Britain and Ireland which were published in July 1968 have now been held by the above-mentioned six accountancy bodies.

In the light of the support for these proposals the Councils have decided that they will submit them to members of the six bodies in the spring of 1969 in order to seek approval in principle and, if such approval is given, authority to take such steps as may be considered necessary to enable formal proposals for the implementation of the scheme to be submitted at a later stage.

The English Institute has further announced, in the February issue of Accountancy, that the Council proposes to convene a special meeting on April 17th in the Royal Albert Hall to seek the approval of members for the scheme in principle and to ask for authority to prepare the necessary changes in the Royal Charter and by-laws. Resolutions to implement the changes would then be submitted to a subsequent special meeting of the Institute later in the year or early in 1970.

It is stated that all views expressed by members at the various local meetings and at similar meetings of the other bodies have been considered by the Joint Steering Committee with a view to agreement being reached on such changes as the six Councils believe to be desirable, though such changes do not materially affect the principles on which the scheme is based and has been discussed.

A summary of the views expressed by members, particularly those critical of the scheme, and the points made in reply on behalf of the Council at the 65 meetings held in district society areas and overseas, are to be issued with the notice convening the April 17th meeting, at which members will have a further opportunity to express their views before recording their votes.
